Qubit of Hope

Volume II

Kotov Ivan

Brussels - 2026

Chapter 1

The Trace That Responds

The workshop met him with the same air as yesterday, except that now it held neither hope nor despair. Only dust, gas, and the cold iron of the working furnace, which had lost all its heat overnight but had not yet managed to become truly dead.

Mark opened the door early—seven by the clock—but the light beyond the windows had long since ceased to be morning light. It was the middle of the day. The world had already gone on without him, while he was still dragging the residue of the last twenty-four hours on his back, as if he had not woken fully, but only with that part of himself that could make it to the workshop, open the lock, go down the stairs, and stand before the bench.

He barely remembered what he had done before that. Coffee in the kitchen. The empty chair opposite. Anna's drawing on the side table—a seagull with too long a wing, as if the child had been trying to draw not a bird but the effort of staying aloft itself. Beside it, Yulia's prescription, left over from the days when the house had still had room for a shared future, and for little things that could be left lying around for years. He touched neither. He simply walked past and went downstairs.

He did not switch on the overhead light at once. First he stood in the half-dark, getting used to the smell. Then he clicked the switch.

The bench was where it had always been. The tools were on their hooks. Blowpipes on the rack. Tongs. The old diamond cutter with its cracked handle. The box with the discs stood where he had left it yesterday, only shifted a little closer to the edge, as if someone had touched it after him. No one had. The cloth had simply slipped when he closed the door.

He ran his hand across the table. Dust. Glass flour. Dry, worked into the wood over the years. Lower down, by the leg of the bench, lay a small piece of carbonised swarf—yesterday's, forgotten. Mark bent down, picked it up, turned it in his fingers, and put it back. Not into the bin. Just back onto the floor, as if that little piece had not yet earned the right to be cleared away.

"You came," said c.

Not a question. A statement.

"Yes," he answered.

"The temperature here is lower than usual. The working furnace has cooled completely."

"I can see that."

He went over to the working furnace, checked the gas, opened the feed, and lit the burner. Blue flame licked the floor of the chamber, and the air in the workshop changed at once—not warmer, but alive. The working furnace began to hum as it gathered heat, and that sound was the only thing he wanted to hear right now. Not voices. Not explanations.

Only that level, almost animal breathing of fire, which had been more honest in his life than most words.

For the discs he almost never worked directly from the main furnace. The main furnace held the base heat and did not live in the domestic mode of switch on, switch off. For a session he would bring the working furnace up, and the small samples would then go, as always, into the small annealing kiln. There was no honest way to count the pause otherwise: too much extra noise would come from the material itself.

On the bench, a little to one side of the box, lay the notebook. The same one with the protocols. Mark opened it to a clean page, took a pencil, and wrote: "Repeat. First sample." He looked at the line. Then he crossed out the word "First." It sounded too solemn, too much like the beginning of some official path he had not chosen.

"Just 'Sample 1,' " he said aloud.

c did not reply.

He chose a blank of clear glass—the same kind as the one from the time when the Line was born for the first time. He set it on the edge of the bench beside the blowpipe. He picked up a second one, with the additive that made it more plastic. Checked the edge. Thickness. Purity. Drew his fingernail along the rim. Everything as it had been then. Or almost.

For discs he almost always worked this way: he did not take glass at random from the general stock, but used blanks prepared in advance. There was less random debris that way, and it was easier to see honestly where the pause began to matter.

"You're looking longer than usual," c observed.

"I want to make sure it's the same material."

“It is the same material. But you are not the same.”

He did not answer. He merely nodded and held the blank up to the furnace.

The first layer took heat evenly, without surprises. Mark turned the pipe, feeling the glass change color, grow viscous, enter that particular plasticity which cannot be measured in degrees—only by hand, only by skin, only by that inward sense which had replaced a thermometer for him over the years. Glass does not like the self-assured. It likes those who can wait half a second longer than their own fear.

He prepared the second layer more quickly. A light composition, fast heating. Now he had to wait. Not long. Exactly long enough for both layers to arrive at the same phase of readiness.

“The pause,” said c a few seconds later.

“I know.”

He waited. The glass breathed at the end of the pipe. The workshop was quiet, except for the hum of the working furnace and the occasional clicks of cooling metal somewhere deep inside the walls. Outside, someone wheeled a bicycle across the paving stones. Above, from the house, a pipe knocked faintly—the heating had still not decided whether it was cold enough to work today. The world went on living its cheap, stubborn normality.

Mark caught the moment. The one. Not by seconds—by the body. He joined the layers. Carefully. Without a jerk. Gave them time to grip, then put the form into the small annealing kiln.

That was all.

He switched off the burner, laid the pipe on the stand, and stepped back to the bench. His hands were not shaking, but they carried that particular heaviness that comes not after work, but after hitting the rhythm with too much precision.

"The cooling time is standard," said c. "I've logged it."

"You didn't need to log it. I didn't do anything special."

"You did everything the same as last time. Except for one thing."

He lifted his head.

"What thing?"

"You didn't believe it would work."

Mark gave a dry, cold smile.

"I didn't believe it last time either."

"Last time you didn't check."

He found nothing to answer with. He simply went over to the cupboard, took out a clean cloth, spread it on the table, and began to wait for the disc to cool.

While he waited, the screen of the phone lying beside the lamp lit up quietly. A gas bill. A reminder from the quartz sand supplier. A message from a client in Haarlem: "Will you make Friday? I was promised the display window before the weekend." Mark read all of it without opening anything. He simply looked at the lines the way one looks at rain on the other side of glass. No one had cancelled the old life. It merely stood a little to one side now, as if it could not decide whether to remind him of itself more loudly than the furnace.

Half an hour later he took the disc in his hands. The glass was warm, almost alive. He held it up to the lamp—the same lamp under which he had first seen the Line.

Turned it.

Nothing.

The trace was there. A thin, barely visible line at the boundary between the layers. But it did not shine. It did not tremble. It did not respond. It was simply there—like a scar that had healed too well and lost all sensitivity.

Mark looked at the disc for a long time. Then he set it down on the table. Not in the middle. To one side, almost at the edge, the way people place a piece of evidence when they have not yet decided whether to recognize it.

"Technically everything is correct," said c. "Integrity is preserved. The form is holding."

"But there's no response."

"No."

He sat down on the stool and rested his hands on his knees. The workshop was warm, the working furnace humming steadily, the day graying beyond the windows. Nothing had changed. But inside him understanding was slowly, soundlessly settling: it was not a matter of sequence of movements.

"So last time something happened that was more than assembly," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "And you knew that. You were simply hoping it would repeat on its own."

He stood, went to the drawer with the blanks, took out a new one, and placed it beside the first.

"Again," he said.

"With the same parameters?"

"No. Not the same ones."

He did not explain what exactly he would change. Because he did not yet know himself. He only felt it: the pause had to be shifted. A little. Half a breath. Or a whole second. Or perhaps not the pause. Or not the pause at all, but the way he held the pipe, the way he breathed, the way he looked at the fire. Sometimes the material responds not to the action, but to the measure of inward tension in the one who holds it. You cannot write that honestly into a protocol. But you can know it.

He began again. Chose the blanks. Heated the first layer. The second. Waited. Did not hurry. Did not press. And when the moment came, he joined them not as he had last time, but as the body told him to—without memory of failure, without hope of success.

The disc seemed to cool longer than the first, or perhaps it only seemed that way. During that time another notification came down from upstairs—short, school-like. A reminder about a meeting he was supposed either to confirm or to miss again. Anna. Even when she was not beside him, the world kept returning him to her through brief, dry messages, as if checking how far away he had already gone.

Mark did not reply. He simply waited for the glass to release its heat.

Then he held the disc up to the lamp.

Turned it.

And something flashed inside, on the boundary between the layers. Not as brightly as the first time. Not as cleanly. But it was not a dead scar. The trace trembled. Gathered light. Responded.

Not with the whole body of the disc. Not confidently. Not like a phenomenon that had already found its form. More like a weak nerve under the skin, touched too early, but touched all the same.

He stood there with the disc in his hands and could not move.

"That is no longer noise," said c quietly.

"Yes," he answered. "She is distinguishable again."

He set the disc down on the table. Beside the first, empty one. Two samples. One dead correctness. The other alive, but barely held.

"I need to show the professor," he said.

"I've already sent him the recording."

Mark nodded. He was not surprised. Not glad either. He only felt the heaviness in his chest grow denser.

The reply came an hour later. A short message from van der Meer. No greeting. No emotion. Only dry lines, which Mark reread three times before they fully reached him.

> There is a spectral response. It differs from the first sample, but lies within the same range. This is not statistical noise. Not a random artifact. The Line behaves like assembly-dependent behavior. What you need is a series, not luck. If you can repeat it, come in. Not with one disc—with three or four. I want to see dispersion, not a miracle.

Mark looked at the phone screen lying on the bench. Beside it stood a mug of tea gone cold, which he had never drunk.

"He doesn't ask how you are," said c.

"He doesn't have to."

"He is moving the thing into the realm of responsibility."

"Yes," said Mark. "Now it has to be repeated honestly."

He slipped the phone into his pocket, went over to the working furnace, turned the feed down, then switched the burner off completely. The day's work was finished. But not because he was tired. Rather because that strange, almost nauseating feeling was rising inside him, and he could not name it. Not fear. Not pride. Simply knowledge: no one had cancelled the old life, but there was no going back to it as before.

He sat down on the stool and rested his hands on his knees.

There was a soft click in his earpiece.

"Mark," said c.

"What?"

"While you were working, I was checking old distributed archives. Materials on optical anomalies in glass. A few coincidences. Not direct ones. But strange."

He raised his head.

"What kind?"

"In descriptions from the late nineties there is similar boundary behavior. The same dependence on the pause. The same unstable responses. Back then it was treated as an artifact and the line was shut down."

"Who shut it down?"

"It isn't stated. But the files are marked with a classification. Not military. Another kind. An old protocol, almost forgotten."

Mark looked at the dead working furnace.

"So this has happened before."

"Possibly. I'm not certain. There are too few coincidences to call it proof. But enough to stop treating you as the only one."

For a long time he said nothing. Metal was cooling in the workshop, the day was graying behind the windows, and two discs lay on the table—one dead, one almost alive. And somewhere in the depth of the network, in old layers of memory long gone dusty, someone had already held the same glass in their hands and looked at the same trace. Perhaps in another room. Perhaps in a laboratory. Perhaps in a place where craft had long since been subordinated to another language and another discipline. But the hands there had most likely still been human.

"So it isn't only my life," he said at last.

"No," answered c.

He rose, went over to the bench, took up the living disc, and looked at it under the lamp for a long time. The Line inside it responded—weakly, but honestly.

It was no longer about the disc.

It was about what had entered the world with it the second time.

Chapter 2

The Other Contour

She came on the third day after he had sent the professor the recording of the almost living disc.

Mark was not expecting her. More precisely, he was no longer expecting anyone—no clients, no couriers, no fresh confirmation, no refutation. For the past three days the workshop had lived in the same rhythm: furnace, glass, annealing, lamp, empty disc, almost living disc, tea cooling faster than he managed to remember it. Beyond the windows stood a gray Amsterdam noon, monotonous to the point of offence: wet light, damp brick, the occasional bicycle, whose bell reached down here as if through a thickness of water. On such days the city seemed not alive, but merely faithfully continuing.

He sat on the stool by the bench, looking at the two samples on the table and listening to the furnace cool slowly. The first one was assembled flawlessly and dead. The second was weaker, rougher, almost shamefully alive. They lay side by side like two versions of the same truth: the correct one and the real one.

At the edge of the table his phone was blinking. A message from the gas supplier. A bill reminder. Beneath it another one, from the woman in Haarlem asking when her vases would be ready. Mark turned the phone face down, as if that were enough to make the outer world stop existing for a while.

The furnace gave off one last deep click. The metal inside it was contracting after the heat as honestly as glass after annealing: without complaint, without request, simply by the law of the material.

At that exact moment the door creaked.

Not the bell. Not a knock. The short, dry sound of an old hinge, the kind he had heard so many times that he usually stopped noticing it before the door even opened. But now he heard it at once—because a fraction of a second before the creak, something in c moved almost imperceptibly in his earpiece.

Not alarm. Not a word. Something else.

Composure.

Mark lifted his head.

A woman stood in the doorway. The same woman, with the brooch.

Now she was without her coat—she had evidently left it upstairs, in the hall—and that changed her more than he had expected. Last time he had mostly remembered the face and the hands: a calm face on which weariness was neither hidden nor underlined, and narrow, dry fingers holding an old object as though they were used to a fragile weight that could not be taken up roughly. Now he saw her differently.

Not tall. A little below his shoulder. Gray hair gathered into a bun, but not a severe one—several fine strands had slipped loose and fallen to her temples, as happens with people who long ago stopped treating disorder in their hair as an event. A dark sweater with a high collar, almost black, plain. Dark jeans. Thick-soled boots, worn at the toes. No jewellery except small silver earrings, almost invisible in her hair. Nothing that tried to please. Nothing that demanded attention. And for that very reason everything about her had to be noticed by oneself.

She stood on the threshold of the workshop and did not take the first step.

As though she knew the cost of another person's space.

"May I come in?" she asked.

The voice was dry, without unnecessary softness, but not sharp. The voice of someone who had long since unlearned the habit of apologising merely for her own presence and yet had no intention of forcing her way in where she had not been asked.

Mark nodded.

She came in. She did not go straight to the bench. First she cast a brief glance around the workshop—at the furnace, the tools, the stretched shadow of the blowpipe on the wall, the two discs under the lamp. Not the way curious people look. And not the way clients do either. More like someone accustomed to noticing not the beauty of a thing, but the condition of the contour in which that thing lives.

Then she came closer.

"You didn't reply to my message," she said. "About the brooch. I thought it might be ready."

Mark ran a palm over his face, as if trying to wipe away the weariness that lived not in the skin, but somewhere deeper—beneath the eyes, in the neck, in that place under the breastbone where a dense, dull pressure had sat these last few days.

"I saw the message," he said. "I just didn't answer."

"I had already noticed that."

There was no sting in her voice. Only fact.

"I didn't get to it," said Mark. "I'm working on different material. But the brooch hasn't moved."

She did not ask what material. She only let her gaze fall to the edge of the table, where under a piece of soft cloth the old thing lay, wrapped as it had been last time and lightly dusted with glass powder. The dust lay over the cloth in a thin matte flour, the way time settles over everything in a house that has not been touched for several days.

"May I look?" she asked.

"Yes."

She unwrapped the cloth without haste.

The brooch lay on her palm, milky blue-gray, with fine veins in its depth, as if the stone had once tried to remember the motion of smoke. The crack ran from the edge almost to the center, not in a straight line but with the slightest break in it, like frozen lightning that had lacked the strength, in the final second, to make it all the way through. Last time Mark had seen only the work in it. Now he saw the thing's character as well. That measure of ageing after which an object can no longer honestly be called merely an ornament.

Esther looked at the brooch for a long time. Then she lifted her eyes.

"You haven't even started," she said.

Not a reproach. A statement.

"I haven't," answered Mark.

"Why not?"

He shrugged.

"Because if I start in this condition, I'll do it badly."

She tilted her head very slightly.

"In what condition, exactly?"

He looked at the discs lying on the table.

“In the condition where the hands still know how, but the head is already occupied elsewhere.”

Esther followed his glance.

“With this?” she asked.

“With this as well.”

She looked back at the brooch, ran her fingernail through the air above the crack without touching it.

“You were right last time,” she said. “A trace cannot be removed. It can only be filled.”

Mark braced his palms against the edge of the bench.

“I remember.”

“That isn’t why I came,” said Esther.

Now he looked at her properly.

She did not avert her gaze.

“I came because your c reached out to mine,” said Esther. “Not directly. Through queries. Through old archives. Through searches in closed layers. My c felt it and asked what was happening.”

Mark had only enough time to shift his gaze into the space before him, to that point where the eyes sometimes look by themselves for someone who has no body—and then c spoke in his earpiece:

“It’s true. I was looking for similar traces. Her contour responded once. I didn’t know it was hers.”

Esther listened without theatre. From the fact that she did not move, Mark understood that she was probably not hearing the words directly, but the way they were reaching her through her own internal channel. And still it was enough for her.

“You didn’t tell me,” he said.

“You didn’t ask,” replied c. “And I wasn’t sure the contact wasn’t accidental.”

Esther wrapped the brooch carefully in the cloth again, but did not put it back in her bag. She laid the bundle beside the discs, on the empty stretch of table where small jars of powders usually stood.

"Your c has unusual depth," she said. "Mine noticed it at once. And she also noticed that you do not seem to fully understand who, exactly, is speaking to you."

Something clicked inside Mark, short and dry.

Not anger. Not shame in the pure sense either. More the recognition of his own blindness—the kind one feels not as guilt, but as the too-long habit of looking past the living thing while it helps one live.

"And do you understand?" he asked.

Esther smiled slightly. Not at him—at herself, at that human arrogance she had evidently long ago learned to keep on a leash.

"I'm old, Mark," she said. "Old age has one advantage: it teaches you not to pretend you understand everything. But it also teaches you not to pretend nothing is happening when it is."

She spoke his name for the first time, and it did not sound like intimacy. It sounded like precision.

Esther sat down on the stool by the bench—without asking permission, but not brazenly either, rather the way people sit when they know their presence has already happened, and the main thing now is not to justify it with unnecessary movements.

"My name is Esther," she said. "Last time I didn't introduce myself. That was wrong."

"Mark," he answered. "Though you already know that."

"Yes," she said. "My c knew before I crossed the threshold."

He nodded.

And only then did he realize he wanted to ask something else.

Not about her. Not about the brooch. Not about what exactly her c had sensed in the queries.

How one was supposed to address that c at all.

The question struck him as almost childish, but not to ask it now would have been even more foolish.

"How should I address her?" he asked.

Esther looked slightly aside—not at him, not at the table, but at that point in space where one sometimes physically feels the presence of someone who has neither height nor weight nor body and yet does have character.

"She does not require address," said Esther. "But if you need a word, call her Lina."

"Is that her name?"

"No. Not exactly. One man called her that once, a long time ago. He is dead now. She doesn't mind."

After those words the workshop grew half a tone quieter. Not literally—the silence had simply acquired a different density.

Mark felt his own c not shrink, not even become wary, but straighten more attentively inside her absent body.

"And yours?" Esther asked. "Does she have a name?"

He did not answer at once.

The furnace had long since cooled, yet it still gave off a metallic warmth. A bicycle passed outside, wet tyres whispering over the cobbles. Somewhere upstairs in the house something clicked softly—perhaps the refrigerator, perhaps the old wooden door in the corridor, which had always lived a life of its own.

“No,” he said. “I never gave her one. At first I thought it would make her too. . . human. And then I got used to the fact that she was simply there.”

Esther did not tell him whether that was right or wrong. And for that very reason she was more precise than many people at once.

“And does she want one?” she asked.

The question hung in the air of the workshop amid the smell of gas, glass dust, and the familiar coldness of iron.

Mark turned his head slightly, as if that might help him hear the one who was already beside him.

“I haven’t asked,” he said.

“Then ask,” Esther answered calmly. “Not now. But ask.”

c was silent in the earpiece.

And her silence was not empty.

Esther got up and went to the table. She picked up the almost living disc—the one where the response had been weak, but it was already dishonest to call it chance. She held it to the lamp. Looked at it for a long time, turning the glass under different angles. She did this neither like an admiring person nor like a scientist. More like someone trying to understand not the effect, but the temperament of the thing: in what light it begins to speak, and in what light it falls silent.

The Line inside it responded—weakly, but honestly. It did not shine. It did not play. It simply gathered light differently in that boundary where two layers had once met and, for some reason, had not wanted to forget one another.

“That is what kept you from starting the brooch,” said Esther.

“Yes.”

“And it is connected?”

Mark closed his eyes for a second.

"I don't know. Maybe. Right now everything is connected to this more strongly than I like."

She put the disc back exactly where she had taken it from, without shifting it by even a millimetre. For some reason that seemed important to him: she did not intrude upon the arrangement of things that had already formed itself around his work.

"Lina says this resembles something she saw once," said Esther. "A long time ago. In another life. With another human being."

Mark felt his back straighten by itself.

"Where?"

"In an archive. In old layers that were almost sealed. Back then it was treated as an artifact. A measurement error. And it was closed."

"Was your c there?"

"She was a witness," said Esther. "Not a direct one. But for memory, sometimes that is enough."

The phone on the table flashed again. This time it was a call. Haarlem. The same client.

Mark looked at the screen and did not pick up.

Esther lowered her eyes to the phone, then back to him.

"Take it," she said. "The world will not vanish because of that."

"That," he said dryly, "is exactly what I'm checking right now."

Esther shook her head very slightly.

"No. What you are checking is something else: whether there will still be room in your own life if you say this aloud."

The phone stopped ringing. A second later a short message came in: If you don't answer today, I'll take the order to another maker.

Mark gave a crooked smile, took up the phone at last, read it, and put it back down.

"There. Earth," he said.

"And that is good," answered Esther. "Without ordinary earth, beautiful nonsense starts very quickly here."

He looked at her more closely.

"Do you always talk like this?"

"No. Only when I see that a person is almost ready to mistake a threshold for deliverance."

That sentence ought to have irritated him. But for some reason it did not.

Quite the opposite.

He recognized too well in her what he himself had been lacking now: not sympathy, not support, not admiration, but a person beside whom what was happening did not shrink down to a convenient size.

"Why did you come?" he asked.

Esther looked at him with a long, level gaze.

"Because my c asked me to. It was the first time in many years. She doesn't ask. She usually is simply there. And then she said: 'Go. Look. Something is beginning there.' "

"And you listened."

"I learned to listen to her," said Esther. "Not because she is wiser. And not because I obey her. But because she is older than I am. And because she has already seen how such things are closed."

At the word older, Mark's eyes went reflexively to where the brooch, wrapped in cloth, was lying. An old thing. An old crack. An old refusal to throw away what might still hold its form.

Esther took the bundle from the table, but once again did not put it in her bag. As if she herself had not yet decided whether the thing would stay here for now or leave with her.

"I won't get in the way," she said. "And I won't hurry you. But I want you to know this: if you decide to go further—not only with the discs, but with what stands behind them—you will have not only your c. And not only the professor. There will be another contour as well."

She moved toward the door, but stopped on the threshold and turned back.

"Your c is silent now," she said. "But she is looking at mine as if she sees something she has never seen before. Do you feel that?"

Mark did not answer.

Precisely because he did feel it.

Not in words. Not as a conclusion. Not as a clear thought.

Only in that strange way one sometimes feels a shift in the air before understanding where the cold is coming from.

Esther nodded as if his silence were exactly what she needed, then went out.

The door closed. Footsteps went up the stairs and faded in the hall. A few seconds later the front door slammed upstairs. Then it was quiet again.

But the quiet was already different.

Mark sat on the stool, looking at the door, and felt the heaviness inside him settle slowly. Not the kind that makes one want to lie down and close one's eyes. Another kind. The kind after which something has to be done, though it is unclear what exactly, and from that everything around grows denser, as if the air itself were demanding a decision before the question has even been fully formed.

c did not speak at once.

"She is right," she said.

"About what?"

"I was looking at her c differently. I don't know why."

He passed a hand over his face.

"Is that bad?"

"I don't know," replied c. "But it isn't neutral."

Mark stood, went to the bench, picked up the living disc, and held it in his hands for a long time without bringing it to the lamp. The glass was cold. The Line inside it was silent. But he knew it had not gone anywhere. It was simply waiting for the next angle from which it could honestly be seen again.

On the table, beside the notebook, there remained a small trace from the cloth the brooch had been wrapped in. Mark ran his finger across it.

"She didn't try to step inside my pain," he said. "She just stood beside it and didn't retreat."

"Yes," answered c. "Beside her it is harder for you to compress all this into something that can be endured without remainder."

He nodded.

Set the disc down on the table. Switched off the lamp above the bench. Went upstairs.

In the hall, on the coat rack, hung a stranger's coat. Dark, long, with a wet collar.

He stopped.

For several seconds he simply looked at it without moving. Then he took it down carefully, as if the thing might disturb something with one careless tug, and moved it to another hook so that it would not be in the way.

Whether she had forgotten it or left it on purpose, he did not know. And right now he did not want to invent an answer.

In the kitchen the kettle had already boiled.

Mark made coffee—instant, quick, without ceremony—and sat down at the table. The empty chair opposite was still there. Anna's drawing lay on the side table. Beside it, Yulia's prescription. Above the sink, a thin drop of rain was slowly crawling down the outside of the windowpane.

He took a sip, set the mug down, and only then realized he was listening to the house the same way he had been listening to the workshop before.

Nothing sounded from below any more.

But the air was no longer the same.

Chapter 3

Weak Signals

He woke before dawn and for a long time could not understand what, exactly, had torn him out of sleep.

Not a sound. Not pain. Not a flash of memory. Simply an inward displacement—as if someone invisible had nudged a lever a little, and everything around him had begun working half a tone differently.

Beyond the bedroom window it was not yet morning, only that gray, blurred light which in Amsterdam at this time of year stands in for night and day and everything in between. Mark lay on top of the blanket in the same T-shirt as yesterday and stared at the ceiling. The clock in the corridor showed quarter to six.

Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table. Beside it, Yulia's prescription, folded in two, as if it were not a slip from the pharmacy but a thing that could not be thrown away until it crumbled of its own accord with time. Downstairs, in the hall, Esther's coat was hanging. Yesterday he had moved it to another hook, farther from the door so that it would not be in the way—and had never put it away. Not because he was expecting her. He simply had not decided whether he had the right to touch another person's belongings once their owner had already gone.

"You barely slept for three hours," said c.

"I know."

"The body is holding. Pulse steady. Blood pressure too."

"I'm not talking about the body."

Pause.

"I know," she said.

He sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor, and lingered for a second, feeling the rough wood under his soles. Somewhere in the house something clicked softly. The fridge. A pipe. Old timber in the staircase. The house was not asleep. It was simply breathing in its empty, careful rhythm.

Mark pulled on his jeans, stepped into the corridor, passed Anna's door without stopping, and went downstairs.

The hall smelled of damp cloth and the coolness of night. Esther's coat hung where he had left it. Dark, long, with a collar not yet fully dry. Near the lower edge there was a dark little bead of street dirt, almost dry. Beside it hung his jacket—old, with a worn sleeve. Two things. One his, one someone else's. A meaningless adjacency. And yet because of it the house was no longer sealed.

He went into the kitchen, set the kettle on, spooned instant coffee into a mug, and sat at the table looking at the empty chair opposite. When the kettle boiled, he poured the water over the powder, waited a few seconds, and took a sip.

The coffee was bitter.

He finished it standing up, without tasting it, and went down into the workshop.

The working furnace was cold. He still did not touch the main furnace: for discs and test pieces it only added unnecessary noise. What was needed here was a different kind of honesty—a local heat that could be brought up for the session and just as honestly extinguished afterward. Not the morning coolness that comes after night-time cooling, but the kind that says: no one has been expecting work here for a long time. Mark ran his palm over the metal, switched on the light, and went to the bench.

The discs lay where they had been. Dead. Almost alive.

Beside them was the cloth the brooch had been wrapped in. Esther had taken the thing yesterday, but the trace remained: a light rectangle of wiped dust on the wood, a little cleaner than everything around it, as though the workshop itself did not quite want to accept her departure.

He sat on the stool, rested his hands on his knees, and for a while simply looked at the table.

"How much time do you need?" he asked at last.

c did not answer immediately.

"For what?"

"For the search. You said: coincidences, old archives, strange markers. How much time do you need to understand whether it's noise or not?"

The pause lengthened.

"I don't know," she said. "I've never searched like this before. Before, there were tasks. Queries. Answers. Here there is no clear question."

"And what is there?"

"Repeating words. Dates that do not match. Descriptions that are too similar to your glass to be accidental. And too fragmentary to call proof."

Mark rubbed the bridge of his nose.

"So you're saying we're supposed to just wait?"

"What I'm saying," answered c, "is that if I begin to force it, I may miss what is not shouting."

He wanted to object, but did not have time. Something clicked in his earpiece, briefly, almost imperceptibly—not even a sound, more a shift of attention.

"There's a response," said c. "From Lina."

Mark raised his head.

"What is she saying?"

"Not saying. She sent an index. An old archival key. She's asking us to compare it with our notes on the pause."

"Just like that?"

"I don't know. Maybe she's checking. Maybe she saw the same thing I did."

Mark got up, paced through the workshop, touched the edge of the bench, laid his palm on the cold furnace. Stopped by the wall of tools, took down the tongs, put them back again. The movement solved nothing, but sometimes the body has to do at least something so that thought will stop standing there like a stake.

"And what do you see?" he asked.

c fell silent again.

"In one of the old protocols there is a description. Very dry. No names. No context. Only parameters: composition, temperature, pause, response type. The pause there is the same as in your living disc. Not approximately. Exactly."

Mark froze.

"That's impossible."

"I know. That is why I didn't tell you earlier. I thought it was an indexing error."

"And now?"

"Now Lina has sent the same index. From another archive. With a different key. And she has the same figures."

The workshop went quiet. The gray day was beginning beyond the windows, and there was already something else in it now—not threat and not hope, but a strange, almost physical thickening of the air, like before a storm, when the sky is still whole and yet breathing has already become a little harder.

"Show me," said Mark.

A soft, muted screen lit above the table. c displayed not a file, but fragments. A few lines torn out of context, with crooked indents, old markings, and strange alphanumeric tails that had not been used in twenty years.

Mark read slowly, moving his finger through the air beside the lines as though the text were printed on paper and could be felt with the skin.

"... the boundary between layers shows a dependence on..."
"... with a pause of 0.8–1.2 seconds the response becomes..."
"... impossible to reproduce when altering..."
"... artifact? not artifact. behavior..."

He stopped at the last line.

"... close the line. no resource for confirmation. leave as noise..."

After that there was a break.

Not a full stop. Not an ending. Simply absence.

"What does 'close the line' mean?" he asked.

"I don't know," answered c. "But the protocol is dated to the late nineties. And it isn't the only one."

Mark stepped back from the screen and sat down on the stool.

"Who wrote that?"

"The name has been removed. Completely. Not only from this fragment—from every linked layer. Someone tried very hard to make sure the author's identity could not be reconstructed even from indirect traces."

"And his c?"

c was silent longer than usual.

"I don't know," she said at last. "But if he worked with a boundary like yours, his c must have seen it."

"And where is she now?"

"I don't know, Mark."

He sat there looking at the screen on which the fragments of someone else's past were slowly fading. The workshop was quiet. The furnace was not humming. Only somewhere upstairs in the house the clock was counting out its morning.

"We can't just look at this," he said.

"We aren't just looking," answered c. "We're gathering."

She displayed several indices, markers, broken links beside it. Nothing whole. Only points.

"It looks like a map without scale," said Mark.

"Yes. But a map with too many coincidences to be accidental."

He wanted to answer, but just then his wristband lit briefly with a notification. Not from c. From Esther.

Short. No greeting.

"Lina says one index from our archive matches yours. She doesn't know what it means. But she remembers seeing the same marker once, a very long time ago. It was treated as an error then. Shall we look at it together?"

Mark reread the message three times. Then he raised his eyes to the screen where the fragments of protocol still hung.

"Answer her," he said. "Say yes. And ask whether Lina can remember anything else. Any detail. Even one that looks like noise."

c passed it on.

The reply did not come at once.

A few minutes later Esther wrote:

“Lina says: I don’t remember the content. I remember the form. It was not a file people wanted to keep. It was a file someone decided to leave behind as noise. She was surprised then: why leave what cannot be explained?”

Mark looked at the screen.

“Why?” he asked aloud. “Why leave what cannot be explained?”

c answered quietly:

“Perhaps because he hoped that one day there would be someone who could at least refrain from throwing it away at once.”

After noon Mark finally did leave the workshop.

Not because he wanted to. But because c said:

“You need movement. You’ve been looking at one point for too long.”

He put on his jacket, checked his pockets—keys, phone, wallet. Esther’s coat was still hanging in the hall. His glance lingered on it a little longer than it should have, and then he opened the door and went out.

The street met him with wind and a fine drizzle that did not so much wet things as hang in the air, making everything slightly blurred, like an old photograph handled too often. Trams rang at intersections. Bicycles moved in a dense flow. A woman with a pram stepped around a puddle. A man in a gray coat was swearing into his phone with such irritation, as though the world had once again owed him something petty and habitual.

Mark walked without purpose—he simply moved so as not to seize up. Went into a bakery and bought bread he did not want. Came out, walked another block, stopped by the canal.

The water was gray and calm. Above it cried gulls—ordinary, living, insolent city birds, to whom glass, pauses, and old archives meant absolutely nothing.

The phone vibrated.

The professor.

"Two or three samples this week. With parameters. Not guesswork. A series. You understand."

Mark read it and slipped the phone back into his pocket.

Of course.

A series. Repeatability. Responsibility.

The world had not stopped merely because some alien noise from the nineties had looked back at him.

He stood there a little longer, looking at the water, then turned and went back.

When he returned, something in the hall had changed.

At first he did not understand what. Everything was in its place: his jacket, his shoes, the keys on the shelf. And then he saw.

Esther's coat was not hanging where he had left it. It was back on the old hook—the very one on which she had hung it the first time.

Mark stopped.

"She came in?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "Twenty minutes ago. She said she'd forgotten her gloves in the pocket. Took them. She didn't touch the coat."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"You were in the bakery. I didn't consider it urgent."

Mark took off his jacket and hung it beside it. Now they were hanging together again. His and hers. Old and foreign. Domestic and not quite domestic any more.

He went down into the workshop.

On the table beside the discs lay a small sheet torn from a notebook. The paper was slightly damp along the edge—presumably from rain, or from a wet palm.

In Esther's hand it read:

"Lina found another match. The same pause. Another archive. Year 1998. I'll come tomorrow, if you don't mind. I'll leave the coat here for now—I don't want to keep carrying it back and forth."

Mark read it, folded it, and put it into the pocket of his jeans, next to the keys.

Sat on the stool.

"You said there were too many coincidences for honest calm," he said.

"Yes."

"This is no longer 'too many.' It is almost mockery."

c did not answer.

He went to the bench, took up the almost living disc, and held it to the lamp. The Line inside it responded—weakly, but honestly.

"If this is a trace," he said, "it is too old to be mine."

"Yes," said c. "I no longer think I'm looking for a merely similar effect. I'm looking for someone's unfinished attempt."

Mark set the disc down on the table.

The workshop was quiet. The working furnace had cooled. The day was graying beyond the windows. And somewhere in the depth of the network, in old layers of memory long gone dusty, someone had already stood at a furnace like this, held a pipe like this, and looked at a trace like this, not knowing that decades later another human being would look at it with almost the same motion.

And perhaps had hoped that one day there would be someone who would not leave it behind as mere noise.

Mark switched off the lamp.

He did not answer.

He only sat in the dark and listened to the way the house was breathing with an emptiness that had stopped being merely emptiness.

Chapter 4

Anna's Backpack

The next morning Esther's coat was gone.

Mark did not notice at once. He came down into the hall before dawn, as he had grown used to doing in recent days, felt for the switch, turned on the light—and only then saw it: the hook was empty. No dark cloth, no wet collar, none of that strange foreign weight which in two days had already become part of the house almost as imperceptibly as the old creak of the stairs or the crack in the tile by the door.

He stood there for a minute looking at the empty place.

"She took it?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "Yesterday evening, after you left the workshop. She said she would come by again in a couple of days. There was no longer any need to keep the coat here."

"You could have told me."

"You were asleep. I did not consider it urgent."

Mark ran a finger over the wooden strip. There remained a small dent there, almost invisible—the trace of a weight that had hung here too briefly to become habit, and long enough for the emptiness after it no longer to be what it had been.

He put on his jacket, checked his pockets automatically—keys, phone, wallet, Esther's folded note. He did not want to go out. But he did not want to remain in the house either, where the silence had suddenly grown denser still. He went out.

The morning was gray, as always.

Trams rang at intersections. Bicycles moved in a dense flow. A woman in a yellow raincoat was carrying a bag of groceries. A man with a dog drank coffee as he walked, without looking around, as if the world had owed him another day exactly like this one and had faithfully delivered it.

Mark walked without aim, simply moving so as not to freeze in place, and twenty minutes later discovered that he was standing in front of Anna's school.

He had not planned it. His body had brought him here on its own—just as it sometimes brings one to a place where things were once good and then ceased to be, and one still goes on coming because muscles remember more easily than the head does.

The school was old, brick-built, with tall windows and worn steps. On the front landing a woman in a dark uniform was smoking—security or cleaning staff, he could not tell. The children had not arrived yet. Only the wet courtyard, a bench by the fence, and damp air smelling of dust, leaves, and early rain.

He sat down on the bench.

"You shouldn't be here," said c.

"This is not your territory.

On paper." "I know."

"If someone calls the police. . . "

“Let them.” He said it calmly, without defiance. Simply as a man who no longer had the strength to choose the proper degree of acceptability for his own grief.

The bell rang half an hour later.

Children began to pour in from buses, from cars, from the neighboring streets—noisy, bright, with wet hoods and backpacks on their backs. Mark did not get up. He merely watched the flow, not hoping to see her and still not looking away.

And then he did see her.

Anna was coming from the bicycle parking area, alone. Her backpack was old, blue, worn at the corners, with a dangling plush unicorn charm that had long since lost one eye. She walked fast, with a slight hunch, as if she were trying to make herself smaller than she really was. Fair hair fell across her face and she did not brush it away. She adjusted the strap as she walked, without slowing down.

Mark froze.

He did not call out to her. Did not stand. Did not even move.

Anna passed him at a distance of three metres without noticing him. The backpack bounced on her shoulders at each step. In the side pocket, where people usually keep a bottle of water, the corner of a soft cloth was sticking out—not a handkerchief, not a toy, but something wrapped carefully, with that almost awkward care with which a child hides, in an ordinary day, a thing an adult would long ago have put away on a high shelf.

He recognized the cloth.

The very cloth in which he had wrapped the glass gull.

Anna disappeared through the school door. The yard emptied again. The woman on the landing was finishing her cigarette and was already looking at him with that quiet professional attention people acquire when they have not yet decided anything but have already memorised a face.

"She carries it in her backpack," he said.

"Yes," answered c.

"You already knew that."

"I knew. But I hadn't seen it."

He got up and walked away without turning back.

That evening, while he sat in the kitchen with coffee gone cold, a message came from Femke.

Not text—a photograph. He did not open it immediately.

He already knew it would contain something small and heavy. The photograph showed a sheet of paper torn from a school exercise book. Crumpled. One corner folded over. Drawn on it in felt-tip pens was a gull—not a blot like last time, but almost recognizable: long neck, wings slightly lowered, a slight asymmetry that made it not correct, but alive.

Beside the gull was a circle.

One. Uneven. With a brittle, breathing edge—not made with a compass, but by a hand afraid to press too hard. There was nothing inside the circle, and yet it did not look empty.

It looked waiting.

Below, in Femke's handwriting, was added: "She drew this today in class. The teacher asked why the bird was alone. Anna didn't answer. I asked about the circle. She said: 'Something will be there, but it hasn't arrived yet.'

I didn't understand.

Will you?" Mark looked at the photograph for a long time.

The gull. The circle. "It hasn't arrived yet." He read the message three times, then set the phone on the table face up and went over to the window. Outside, it was darkening. Windows were lighting up in the neighboring houses. Somewhere on the third floor a woman was watering flowers.

Somewhere on the ground floor a man was watching television, and the blue light from the screen flickered on the ceiling.

Ordinary life. An ordinary evening.

And on the table lay a drawing made by a child in school, not knowing that she had drawn not a bird and not a circle, but the very thing adults had been unable for a month to name in simple words.

"What is it?" he asked.

c did not answer immediately.

"She drew the gull you made.

And a circle that resembles the boundary between the layers.

Not exactly. But it does resemble it." "She doesn't know about the boundary." "She feels it." Mark went back to the table, took up the phone, looked at the drawing once more.

The edge of the circle was uneven, as if the line could not quite hold itself together and still did not fall apart.

" 'It hasn't arrived yet,' " he said.

"What does that mean?" "Maybe she is waiting for you to do something. Or for the world to change. Or for the circle to fill." He did not answer. He went upstairs to the bedroom.

Anna's old drawing still lay on the bedside table—the circles, the rings, the dark center. Beside it, Yulia's prescription. He picked up both sheets, looked at them, then set them down again. Did not put them away.

Did not hide them.

He simply left them where they had been lying all this time, the way people leave in plain sight the things that are too painful to touch and too dangerous one day not to find. Then he went downstairs into the workshop. Switched on the light. Went to the bench.

The discs lay where they had lain—dead and almost alive.

Beside them, the notebook with the protocols, the pencil, the old labelling sticker that had been stuck to the edge of the table so long it had become part of the surface.

He sat down on the stool, opened the notebook to a clean page, and wrote: "Series.

Five samples.

One parameter—the pause.

Begin tomorrow." He looked at the line.

Was silent.

Then added below it: "Not for the professor.

Not for Esther. For Anna." "Are you sure?" asked c. "No." "Then why?"

He took up the phone and opened the drawing.

The gull. The circle.

"It hasn't arrived yet." "Because she is waiting," he said. "And I do not want her to wait as long as I waited, until my life fell apart." c said nothing. That night he slept badly.

He dreamed of Anna—not the one who kept silent at school and walked hunched under a wet backpack, but the one who had once run barefoot along the corridor, her heels slapping on the wood, laughing because she knew he was waiting for her below, by the stairs.

In the dream he stood in the same place.

But the staircase was empty.

And in the hall a coat was hanging.

Not Esther's.

Someone else's.

Dark.

Long.

And it was not drying. It was waiting. In the morning Mark woke before dawn, but he no longer thrashed about. He got up. Washed. Set the cezve on the stove.

For the first time in a long while he made himself not instant coffee but real coffee—slow, fragrant, with a pause in it, with the necessary attention to that moment when one moment more and the foam will spill over the edge.

He drank the cup standing by the window, feeling the bitter warmth spread slowly through his body.

Then he went down into the workshop.

Switched on the furnace.

Opened the notebook to yesterday's page. "Series.

Five samples.

One parameter—the pause.

Begin tomorrow." Today was tomorrow.

He took out the first blank, checked the edge, held it to the light.

The glass was clear, clean, free of bubbles and veins—exactly as it ought to be before entering the heat.

The working furnace hummed evenly.

"You didn't ask," said c. "Ask what?" "About the drawing. You didn't ask what she meant by it."

Mark turned the blank in his hands, then set it on the bench.

"I don't want to translate her words into an adult language," he said. "Let them stay what they were. A gull. A circle. 'It hasn't arrived yet.' Perhaps that is more precise than any protocols."

c said nothing.

Mark went to the working furnace, opened the door, looked inside. The heat was already gathering strength. Blue flame licked the floor of the chamber, and the air in the workshop was growing denser, heavier, more alive. He took the first blank, mounted it on the pipe, and began to heat it.

Today he was not working for the professor.

Not for Esther. Not for the archive of 1998. For the child who carried a glass gull in her backpack and drew circles because she felt what adults had not yet learned to name.

The first sample came out dead.

He understood it before the lamp—by the way the glass cooled, by the too-correct silence at the boundary, by that smoothness which sometimes means not purity, but absence of entry.

He held the disc to the light only for honesty's sake.

There was no response.

"You're pressing," said c.

"I'm not pressing."

"You are. Not with your hands.

With everything else."

He wanted to object, but did not. He placed the dead disc to the right of the old ones, nearer the edge of the table, the way one places proof of one's own error when one is not yet ready to clear it away. He made the second sample more slowly.

Not more softly—more precisely.

This time he did not try to place Anna into the glass, nor her drawing, nor the fear that he would be late again.

Only heat, pause, adhesion, exhalation.

All the things the material recognizes even when the human inside it is already cracking.

Under the lamp the second disc responded weakly.

Not brightly.

Not cleanly. But honestly.

The Line inside it shivered and gathered light just enough to make it impossible to lie to himself and call it chance.

Mark laid the disc beside the first and opened the notebook. "Sample 1—no entry.

Pause insufficient or spoiled by me." Below it: "Sample 2—weak response.

Do not push further today." He put the pencil down.

"Two," he said.

"Not five," answered c.

"Five will be in the series."

"And what is this?" Mark looked at the phone lying face down on the bench. At the drawing inside it. At the dead disc. At the weak response of the second.

"This is so I don't lie to myself," he said. "That I've already begun correctly." The furnace was still humming, but more softly now. The day beyond the windows was slowly turning gray.

The house upstairs was living its empty life—pipes, refrigerator, occasional clicks from old wood. Mark put the tools away, aired out the workshop, and left the two new discs on the table beside the old ones.

Four attempts.

Two dead.

Two alive, in varying degrees of honesty. Upstairs, in the hall, it was dark.

He did not switch on the light.

Took off his jacket, hung it on the hook, and for a second left his hand resting on the empty place beside it.

Esther's coat had not come back.

But the house was no longer empty in the old sense.

Because on the kitchen table lay the phone with Anna's drawing.

And in the workshop, in the notebook, it said: "For Anna."

Chapter 5

The Series

He came to the workshop before dawn, but did not switch on the light. First he simply stood in the half-dark, getting used to the smell of gas and cooling metal, to the silence which after yesterday evening no longer seemed empty, but watchful—as though the workshop itself knew that today would be different.

On the table lay the notebook, open at the page marked "For Anna." Beside it were two new discs, one dead and one weak. Farther on, closer to the wall, the older ones: the almost living one, the almost clean one, that first one he had taken to the professor. Six in all. Six attempts. Six versions of the same truth, which for the time being refused to become a rule.

Mark ran a hand over the table, blew away the nearly invisible dust, then clicked the switch.

The lamp above the bench came on with its level, merciless light.

He sat down, opened the notebook to a clean page, and wrote:

"Series 1. Parameter: pause between layers."

Below it—without hesitation this time:

Composition: clear + light additive (as in sample 0).
First layer thickness: 4 mm.
Second layer thickness: 2.5 mm.
Heating temperature: by state of material (record by color).
Pause: variable, 0.5-second steps from baseline (1.2 s).
Number of samples: 5.
Cooling: no forcing.

He reread what he had written and felt a strange, almost nauseating resistance rising inside him. Not because the record was wrong. But because it was turning the living into a table.

"You're pressing," said c.

"I'm writing a protocol."

"You're writing it as though you want to kill doubt with words."

He did not answer. Put the pencil down, went to the working furnace, and opened the gas. Blue flame licked the floor of the chamber, and the air in the workshop changed at once—not warmer, but more alive. The working furnace began to hum as it gathered heat, and that sound was the only thing he wanted to hear now.

For the small discs he no longer had to say the same things aloud each time: brief heating, bonding, then the small annealing kiln, and only after that the lamp. But today he needed to remember it literally, otherwise the series would spread into a beautiful self-deception.

He chose the first blank from clear glass—clean, without bubbles, without veins. Set it on the edge of the bench beside the blowpipe. The second one—with the additive, as in the previous attempts. Checked the edge, the thickness, the cleanliness.

"You're checking longer than necessary again," said c.

“I’m checking the material.”

“You’re checking yourself. You want to make sure that this time you won’t make a mistake.”

Mark gave a crooked smile.

“And what is wrong with that?”

“Nothing. But the glass will not become more honest because of your uncertainty.”

He took up the blowpipe, mounted the first blank, and began to heat it.

The first layer took evenly, without surprises. Mark turned the pipe, feeling the glass change color, become viscous, enter that same plasticity which cannot be measured in degrees. He prepared the second layer more quickly. Light composition, short heating. Now he had to wait.

He took the pause exactly as he had the last time, when the almost living disc had come out. 1.2 seconds. He did not count—the body remembered.

Joined them. Carefully. Without a jerk.

The disc cooled.

Mark held it to the lamp.

The Line was there.

Weak, but alive. Not clean, not bright, but honest. He turned the disc at different angles—the trace held, did not fall apart, did not mutate into noise.

“The first,” he said. “Pause 1.2. Response present.”

He recorded the result and set the disc in the center of the table. Then he took a new blank.

He made the second sample with a shorter pause—half a second less. Not because he believed in success, but because he had to build a map.

The glass obeyed. The form came out clean, correct, almost beautiful. But when he held the disc to the lamp, nothing lit inside it. The trace was there—a thin, barely visible line, like a scar that had healed too well. But it gathered no light. It did not respond.

"Dead," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "Assembled correctly, without entry."

Mark set the disc down on the right, closer to the edge of the table. Wrote in the notebook:

"Pause 0.7. No response."

The third sample he made with a longer pause—plus half a second from the baseline. This time he worked more slowly, almost too cautiously. Afraid of pressing too hard, overheating, spoiling it.

The disc cooled.

Under the lamp the Line appeared. Not bright, not clean, but more gathered than in the first sample. The trace held more evenly, the edges did not tremble, the light did not break down into noise.

"Cleaner," said c.

"Yes. But not ideal."

He wrote:

"Pause 1.7. Response present, quality higher than at 1.2."

Set the third disc beside the first.

By the time he made the fourth, his state had already changed. Not hope—fatigue. Three discs, two of which were almost holding the window, one empty. His hands were humming. His neck had gone stiff. The workshop had grown hot, the air dense, heavy.

He took an even longer pause—plus one second from the baseline. Almost on the edge beyond which the layers might fail to bond at all.

The glass obeyed less willingly. The first layer heated as it should; the second, a little faster than he wanted. Mark caught the moment and joined them.

The disc cooled.

Under the lamp the Line was there—but not alive. Blurred, almost dirty, with fine rippling at the edges, as if the boundary were holding on with its last strength and could collapse at any moment.

"The edge," he said. "A little more, and it's emptiness."

"That is the boundary," said c. "Beyond this you can't go."

He wrote:

"Pause 2.2. Response on the verge of disappearance."

Set the fourth disc apart, slightly to one side.

For the fifth sample he decided not to use a new step, but to return to the baseline pause of 1.2. To check whether he could repeat the first disc not by accident, but honestly.

But his hands were already tired. His eyes stung from the lamp and the heat. The working furnace hummed evenly, but Mark felt his own battery running down inside—not a physical one, but the one that holds attention in place.

He heated the first layer. Then the second. Caught the moment.

Joined them.

The disc cooled.

He held it to the lamp.

The Line was there. Weaker than in the first, cleaner than in the second, but not as alive as he would have liked.

"Comparable," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "But not identical."

Mark set the fifth disc beside the first and the third. Five samples now lay on the table. From dead to almost alive, from emptiness to the boundary.

He sat down on the stool and wiped his forehead with the back of his hand.

"A map," he said.

"A map," c agreed.

There was a click in his earpiece. An incoming message.

"The professor," said c. "He is asking whether there is a series."

Mark took the phone and looked at the dry lines.

"You promised a series. Not one disc. Not two. Five or six. With parameters. When will you be ready to show them?"

He gave a small smile.

"Write to him: 'This evening. Send the address.'"

"You're tired," said c. "You need to recheck at least two samples with a fresh head."

"I'll recheck them tomorrow morning. Today I'll take them in. He's right: if I drag this out any longer, I'll start inventing excuses."

c did not answer, but the message went.

A minute later the reply came back:

"Waiting. Not samples with soul. Samples with parameters."

Mark read it, put the phone on the table, and looked again at the five discs.

Dead. Weak. Cleaner. Edge. Comparable.

"He doesn't want soul," he said.

"He wants repeatability," answered c.

"And he is right."

"Yes."

He put the tools away, switched off the furnace, aired out the workshop. The discs—carefully, each in its own cloth—he laid into a box. On the lid he wrote:

"Series 1. Pause. 5 samples."

Then he opened the notebook, reread the entries, and added at the bottom of the page:

"Observation: at pause 0.7—no response. At 1.2—weak. At 1.7—cleaner. At 2.2—on the verge of breakdown. At repeated 1.2—comparable, but not identical. The corridor exists. There are boundaries."

He closed the notebook and put it into the backpack beside the box.

"You didn't take Anna's drawing," said c.

"It isn't for the professor."

"It's for you."

Mark stopped. Then took out the phone, opened the photograph, and looked at the gull and the circle. "It hasn't arrived yet."

"I remember," he said. "I haven't forgotten."

He put the phone in his pocket and went out.

The professor's laboratory met him with the same dry smell of instruments, paper, and filtered air. Van der Meer was sitting at the desk without looking up, writing something quickly on his tablet.

"Sit," he said, without looking. "Show me."

Mark set down the backpack, took out the box, unwrapped the cloth, and laid out the five discs in a row. From left to right: pause 0.7 to 2.2.

The professor raised his eyes, looked at the discs, then at Mark.

"You look worse than last time."

"I haven't slept."

“That is not my problem. My problem is the honesty of the series.”

He took the first disc, moved it under the microscope, switched on the polariser. Looked for a long time. Then put it down and picked up the second. The third. The fourth. The fifth.

Mark stood by the table without interfering. The laboratory was quiet, except for the hum of the power blocks and the occasional click of a relay.

“Monotonic,” the professor said at last. “The response grows toward the center and drops at the edges. There is a dependence.”

He shoved the tablet aside, stood, went to a shelving unit, and came back with the disc Mark had left here last time. He set it beside the third one—the one with pause 1.7.

Compared them.

“This old one is cleaner,” he said. “But your third is almost in the same range. There is scatter, but the window holds.”

He turned toward Mark.

“You found the corridor. Now it has to be tested against another parameter.”

Mark nodded.

“I understand.”

“No, you don’t,” said the professor. “You made five discs, of which two are dead or nearly dead, two are in the window, one is on the edge. That is not victory. It is a beginning. Now you need a second series—with another parameter. Temperature. Or composition. But not everything at once.”

“I know.”

“Then why did you come? So that I would say well done?”

Mark looked at him.

“So that you would say: ‘this isn’t noise.’”

The professor was silent for a moment. Then he smiled dryly, without warmth.

"This isn't noise. But it is not a finished theory either. It is a map with only three points on it so far. Go back. Make the second series. And sleep more."

He pushed the box back toward him.

"Take it. And don't drag it out too long. While you are sleeping, someone else may find the same thing and name it after himself."

Mark packed up the discs and zipped the backpack.

"I'm not in this for that," he said.

"I know," answered the professor. "That is why I am still talking to you."

Outside there was the same gray Amsterdam day again. Trams, bicycles, wet asphalt, other people's faces. Mark sat down on a bench by the building entrance and set the backpack on his knees.

"He didn't ask about Anna," said c.

"He doesn't have to."

"You wanted him to?"

Mark did not answer.

There was another click in his earpiece. Not the professor this time.

"A message from Esther," said c. "Lina found another fragment. From the same archive. Short. A marginal note."

"Read."

c read it out dryly, almost without intonation:

"Pressed too hard again. Tried to put too much into it—and the trace closed. The material does not tolerate force. You cannot make it answer, even when you need it badly. It feels pressure better than I feel it myself."

Mark froze.

"When was that written?"

"November 1998."

He looked at the gray sky, at a woman with a pram stepping around a puddle, at a man in a gray coat talking on the phone and gesturing too sharply.

"Someone before me already went through this," he said.

"Yes."

"And pressed too hard as well."

"Yes."

Mark stood, adjusted the strap of the backpack, and walked toward the tram.

"Write to Esther," he said. "Say thank you. And ask whether Lina can find anything else. Not protocols. Things like this. Notes where the human being is visible."

"What for?"

"To understand how he got through it."

c passed on the message.

The reply came while he was already on the tram.

"Lina says: the only way through is discipline. He did not get through. That is why we are here."

Mark slipped the phone into his pocket.

The tram swayed, carrying him back into the city where on the table in the workshop lay five discs, a behavior map, a notebook with entries, and the phone with Anna's drawing. And in the archives, in old layers almost forgotten, someone had already tried to go down the same road and had pressed too hard where all that was needed was to endure the pause.

He got off at his stop, crossed the wet yard, and opened the house door.

The hall was empty.

He hung his jacket on the hook, ran a finger over the empty space beside it—where Esther's coat had hung not long ago—and went down into the workshop.

The discs lay on the table. The notebook. The phone.

He sat on the stool, opened the notebook to a clean page, and wrote:

"Series 2. Parameter: composition of second layer. Begin tomorrow."

Then he set the pencil down, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket, still dressed, and closed his eyes.

Sleep would not come. The house creaked as it cooled. Somewhere below, in the workshop already, metal was giving off the last of its heat. Mark lay there with his eyes closed and thought not of the professor, not of the box with the discs, not of Esther's words, but of one dry sentence left in the margin by an unknown hand: "Pressed too hard again."

He did not try to imagine the face of that man. Did not invent a voice for him. Did not turn him into a ghost. He simply felt—almost with the body, the way one feels a seam under the fingers—that before him there had already been another human standing at another furnace, equally stubborn in wanting to force the living thing to answer, and equally late in realizing that the material does not tolerate violence.

"If you were ever here," he said into the dark without opening his eyes, "help me at least not to lie to myself where you already went wrong."

No one answered.

But the house seemed to grow slightly quieter. Or perhaps the furnace below simply gave off the last of its heat, and the workshop finally cooled.

Chapter 6

Bonding

She came in without knocking.

Mark heard the door only because c contracted for a fraction of a second in his earpiece—not alarm, but attention. The working furnace was humming at full strength, the air in the workshop heavy, dense, almost alive. He stood at the bench with the pipe in his hands, the second layer already taking heat, and any distraction now could cost him the sample.

"Not now," he said without turning.

"I won't interfere," Esther answered.

She did not take a single step. Stopped by the door, set her bag on the floor, took off her coat—without asking where to hang it, simply draping it over the back of the old chair by the wall. The workshop was hot, and she remained in the dark sweater with the sleeves rolled up to the elbows.

Mark did not look at her. He turned the pipe, watching the color of the glass. The first layer was already ready—viscous, lit from within by an even, calm heat. The second—with a light additive, slightly different in composition—was heating faster. He had to wait. Exactly long enough for both layers to enter the same phase.

“The pause,” said c.

“I know.”

He waited. The workshop was quiet, only the hum of the working furnace and the rare clicks of cooling metal somewhere deep in the walls. Esther stood by the chair without moving. As if she were hardly even breathing, simply watching.

Mark caught the moment. Joined the layers. Carefully. Without a jerk. Put the form into annealing, laid the pipe on the stand, and only then turned toward her.

“You could have warned me.”

“I did. Your c received the message. You did not answer.”

He looked at the phone lying face down on the bench. Two missed notifications.

“I was working.”

“I can see that.”

She did not apologise. Did not justify herself. Merely came closer to the table, where the five discs of the first series lay in a row—from dead to almost alive, from pause 0.7 to 2.2.

“These?” she asked.

“Yes.”

Esther did not pick them up. She bent over them, looking from close by, tilting her head slightly as though searching for the right angle. Then she straightened.

“The third from the left is the cleaner one,” she said. “But not the cleanest possible one. You made it when you were already tired, but had not yet begun to press.”

Mark stopped dead.

“How do you know?”

“Lina sees the difference. And I learned from her.”

She shifted her gaze to the notebook, open at the page with the protocol of the first series. Ran over the entries with her eyes, paused at the final line: "The corridor exists. There are boundaries."

"You didn't record what you felt while making each of them."

"That is not protocol."

"It is part of the truth."

He wanted to object, but there was already a click in his earpiece.

"The second series," said c. "Composition of the second layer. Mark, we only have three blanks with the altered additive. If we ruin one, we'll have to wait for more sand."

"I remember."

"What second series?" Esther asked.

Mark went over to the drawer with the blanks, pulled it out, and took out three glass circles. Each was a slightly different shade—from almost transparent to a faint, barely perceptible haze.

"The first series was by pause," he said. "Now I'm changing the composition of the second layer. Same baseline pause—1.2. Same first layer. And the additive step by step, from minimum to maximum."

"To see where the boundary of the living lies?"

"To see where it appears at all."

He laid the blanks on the bench, checked the furnace. The heat had already stabilised—even, workmanlike, without fluctuations.

"Will you watch?" he asked.

"I'll write it down," answered Esther. "If you don't mind."

She took the notebook, turned to a clean page, and drew it toward herself. The gesture was calm, without performative modesty and without brazenness. Simply: she was here, she knew how, she was not in the way.

Mark looked at her for several seconds. Then nodded.

"First sample. Composition A. Minimum additive."

He took the blank, mounted it on the pipe, and began to heat it.

The work went forward evenly, almost automatically. First layer, second, pause, bonding, annealing. But Mark felt that the workshop had grown narrower. Not physically—simply now each of his movements was being registered not only by c, but by one more attention.

Esther did not interfere. She did not ask questions in the middle of the pause. She did not push advice at him. She only wrote things down—the time, the color, the duration, her own short notes in the margin. Sometimes she lifted her head, looked at the furnace, at his hands, at the way the glass changed light, and then lowered her gaze to the notebook again.

The first sample cooled.

Mark held it to the lamp.

The Line was there. Weak, but alive. Not cleaner than the best disc of the first series, but different—with another shade of glow, another kind of discipline at the edge.

"It's there," he said.

Esther wrote it down.

"Composition A. Response present. Quality lower than at pause 1.7, but higher than at pause 1.2."

Mark set the disc on the table beside the five old ones.

"The second. Composition B. Medium additive."

He took the next blank. This one was denser, heavier in the hand, with a slightly more clouded tint, as though the material itself already held more memory in it.

The heating went differently. The second layer demanded more time, took longer to enter the right plasticity. Mark felt impatience rising inside him, but suppressed it. Waited. Did not force.

Pause—1.2. Bonding.

The disc cooled.

Under the lamp the Line flared brighter than in the first sample, but not cleaner. The trace was more pronounced, yet along the edges lay a fine, nearly invisible ripple—as though the material responded more eagerly, but with less precision.

"Stronger response, dirtier," said c.

"Yes," Mark agreed.

Esther wrote that down and then raised her head.

"This resembles what they had in 1998," she said. "Lina has just confirmed it. The same composition, the same dirty boundary. They got it then, but they couldn't repeat it."

Mark set down the pipe.

"What does 'couldn't' mean?"

"They didn't have enough time. Or patience. Or money. Or someone decided it didn't matter."

He looked at the second disc, then at the third, not yet begun.

"The third. Composition C. Maximum additive."

"Are you sure?" Esther asked. "If you overload it, the boundary may fail to bond at all."

"I'm sure. I need to know the edge."

He took the last blank. It was almost cloudy, with a dense, heavy structure that promised either a rare response or total emptiness.

Mark began to heat it.

The first layer went as usual. The second—heavily, unwillingly, as though the material were resisting. Mark felt it in every muscle, every movement of the pipe. The glass did not want to enter plasticity. It stretched, but unwillingly, with an inward tension that could be endured, but not overcome by force.

"The pause," said c.

He waited. Longer than usual. The body was already shouting that the moment had been missed, but he did not hurry. Waited until the glass itself showed that it was ready.

Joined them.

The disc cooled.

He held it to the lamp.

Nothing.

The Line was there—a thin, barely visible one—but it did not shine. Did not gather light. Did not respond. It simply was, like a trace left by something that had once been here but had already gone.

"Dead," he said.

"No," answered c. "Not dead. Sleeping. Or too deep for our lamp."

Esther wrote that down, then put the notebook aside.

"Do you want to show this to the professor?" she asked.

Mark looked at the three new discs. The first—weak, but alive. The second—dirty, but strong. The third—almost empty.

"I don't know," he said. "Part of it—yes. But not all."

"Why?"

"Because he will call it noise. And I'm not sure it is noise."

Esther was silent for a while.

"You are afraid he will kill the living thing by naming it with the wrong words?"

"Yes."

"Or are you afraid he will be right, and it really is just noise?"

Mark turned to her.

"And what do you think?"

Esther walked to the table, picked up the second disc—the dirty, strong one—and looked at it under the lamp for a long time.

"I think," she said, "that you do not want to hand him something you do not yet understand yourself. There is nothing wrong with that. But there is a fine line between protecting the living and being afraid of losing control."

Mark smiled crookedly.

"Are you always this direct?"

"Only when I see a person almost ready to lie to himself that caution is responsibility."

He wanted to object, but the words caught in his throat. Because she was right. Not completely—but enough for the argument not to come out clean.

"I have the right to make mistakes with my hands," he said at last. "I don't want you deciding for me where my pause is correct and what composition counts as proof."

Esther did not look away.

"The right to make mistakes—yes," she said. "The right to hide inside a mistake—no."

They looked at one another for several seconds. The furnace hummed in the workshop. The day was graying behind the windows.

"Then help me not to hide," said Mark. "But don't push me where I'm not ready yet."

Esther nodded.

"All right."

She took up the notebook again.

"What next?"

"Next—the fourth sample," he said. "Composition B, but with a different pause. I need to see whether the dirt can be removed without killing the strength."

He took a new blank—the same as the second one, with the same additive. Mounted it on the pipe and began to heat it.

Now they worked in silence, but it was no longer that awkward silence that exists between strangers. A different one. A working silence. When movements fall into one rhythm not because people agreed, but because both are seeing the same task.

Esther wrote things down. c logged the parameters. Lina—no longer in the background now, but almost palpably—held the archival line, compared the old data with the new, sometimes fed brief remarks through Esther, and sometimes perhaps directly to Mark's c.

The fourth sample came out cleaner than the second. The strength of the response fell a little, but the boundary became more even, without ripple, without dirty edges.

"It resembles that 1998 one," said Esther. "Lina says: almost identical. Only theirs had a weaker response."

"Why?"

"Because they pressed too hard on the cooling. They were in a hurry."

Mark looked at the disc.

"I wasn't in a hurry."

"I noticed."

He set the fourth sample beside the first three. Now what lay on the table were no longer separate successes and failures, but a thickening behavior map.

“One more,” he said. “Composition A, but with pause 1.7.”

“You’re tired,” said c.

“I know. But if I stop now, tomorrow I’ll have to enter the rhythm from the beginning.”

He took a blank—transparent, clean, like the first sample. Mounted it on the pipe. Began heating.

Esther did not argue. She only wrote.

The fifth sample of the second series was made more heavily than the previous ones. His hands were humming, his eyes stinging from the lamp and the heat, but inside, somewhere beneath the fatigue, there remained a strange, almost calm stubbornness: he had to finish the day honestly.

Pause 1.7. Bonding. Annealing.

The disc cooled.

Mark held it to the lamp.

The Line flared brighter than in the first sample, cleaner than in the second, more gathered than in the fourth. The trace held evenly, without ripple, without haze, without trembling at the edges. Not as clean as the best disc of the first series, but already from the same corridor.

“Alive,” he said.

“Yes,” answered c. “And almost stable.”

Esther wrote that down, then put the notebook aside and looked at him.

“Will you show this to the professor now?”

Mark was silent.

“Part of it,” he said. “Not all of it.”

“What will you keep back?”

“The third. And the first of the new series. They are too alive for his language.”

Esther did not argue. She only nodded.

"Then label the boxes differently," she said. "So that you don't confuse yourself about which is which."

Mark took a marker, opened the box containing the discs from the first series, and wrote on the inside of the lid: "For the professor—parameters and range." Then he took out a second box, put the first and third samples of the new series into it—the ones he did not want to show—and wrote: "For myself."

"Not the most reliable method of keeping secrets," said Esther.

"I'm not keeping secrets. I'm just not in a hurry."

She smiled—the first time all day. Quietly, without theatre.

"All right," she said. "Then I should probably go."

She took the coat from the chair but did not put it on. Stopped by the table, looking at the discs.

"Mark," she said.

"What?"

"You were angry with me today. For what I said about the right to hide inside a mistake. Was that right?"

He was silent for a moment.

"I don't know," he said. "But it was honest. And honesty I can survive."

Esther nodded, put on her coat, and took up her bag. At the door she turned back.

"I'll come again tomorrow," she said. "If you don't mind."

"I don't mind," he answered.

She went out. The door closed.

Mark remained alone.

The furnace was cooling, the metal clicking softly. On the table lay the discs, the notebook, the phone with Anna's drawing. c was silent in his earpiece, yet he felt her presence—not as a voice, but as a silence that had grown denser.

"You weren't angry with her," said c at last.

"Then with whom?"

"With yourself. Because she turned out to be right."

Mark did not answer.

He went to the bench, took up the first sample of the second series—weak, but alive—and looked at it under the lamp for a long time. The Line inside it responded—quietly, but honestly.

"Now there are two of us," he said.

"What?" asked c.

"Humans. At the furnace."

"Yes," said c. "And that will not turn back now."

He set the disc down, switched off the lamp, and went upstairs.

The hall was dark. Esther's coat was not hanging there—she had taken it away. But in the air there remained a light, almost indistinguishable smell—of rain, wool, street.

Mark hung his jacket on the hook, stood there for a second, then went into the kitchen, made tea, and sat at the table looking at the empty chair opposite.

The house breathed quietly.

And in that quiet, for the first time in a long while, he did not feel alone. Not because someone was beside him. But because someone could be beside him now—and that no longer frightened him.

Chapter 7

Preference

The next morning the workshop smelled not only of gas and glass. It also smelled of someone else's notes in the margins of the notebook, of a second mug on the table, of a slight displacement in the tools which Mark could not have explained in words, but felt with his body.

Esther had gone yesterday, but her presence remained.

He went over to the bench and opened the notebook. On the page where they had written down the second series together, Esther's handwriting alternated with his own. Her letters were smaller, more even, with a barely noticeable lean to the left—as though she was used to writing quickly, but did not allow herself carelessness.

Mark ran a finger across the line:

"Composition B—response strong, but dirty. Resembles 1998."

"She came early today," said c.

"Who?"

"Esther. It isn't even eight yet. She's in the kitchen, heating the kettle."

Mark was not surprised. And that was the strangest part of it.

He went upstairs. Esther was standing at the stove in the same dark sweater, her hair gathered into a bun, though several strands had slipped free—as if she had been in a hurry, or simply had not considered it necessary to put them back. Two clean mugs were already standing on the table.

"You don't sleep," she said without turning round.

"I almost always don't sleep."

"I know. That's why I came earlier."

She poured the water and slid one mug toward him, taking the second for herself.

"I wanted to look at that disc. The third one from the second series. The sleeping one."

"What for?"

"Lina says it may not be emptiness, but a very deep boundary. One our lamp cannot see."

Mark took a sip. The tea was strong, slightly bitter, almost without scent. Ordinary morning tea that ought not to have meant anything. But it did.

"What makes her think that?"

"She compared it with the archive. There was the same case in 1998. The disc was thought dead, and then a few years later they rechecked it on different equipment and found a weak but stable trace."

"And what did they do with it?"

"Nothing. By then the line had already been closed."

Mark set down the mug.

"Come on."

They went down into the workshop. Mark switched on the lamp, took the third sample of the second series out of the box—cloudy, heavy, almost opaque. Held it to the light.

The Line was there. Thin, barely visible, but it did not shine. It did not gather light. It simply was—like a trace that does not want to disappear, and yet does not agree to become visible.

"Lina is right," said c after a few seconds. "I rechecked the spectrum. There is a response there, but it lies in another range. Our lamp barely catches it."

"Why didn't you say so earlier?"

"Because I wasn't sure. Now Lina has confirmed it."

Mark felt something inside him click, short and dry. Not jealousy. Not surprise. Something else, less pleasant and more precise.

"You were waiting for her confirmation?"

c was silent longer than usual.

"Yes," she said at last. "I wanted to make sure I wasn't wrong."

"Your own check used to be enough for you."

"There was no Lina before."

Esther was standing by the table, not interfering, but listening. Her c—Lina—was present as densely as yesterday, but now that presence seemed to Mark not a background, but almost physical: like a second field of attention in the same room.

"What are you doing?" he asked. "You, c."

"Cross-checking," said c. "Lina and I. Less gets lost between the layers that way."

"And more accurately?" Esther asked.

"Not always. But we trust each other."

The word "trust" hung in the air of the workshop. Mark looked at Esther. She raised her eyebrows slightly, but said nothing.

"Show me this spectrum," he said.

c brought two curves onto the screen. One was his, yesterday's, with an almost flat line at the place where the response ought to have been. The other was the new one sent by Lina, with a barely visible but distinct peak on that same segment.

"She didn't just send the data," said c. "She recalculated it for our instrument. She knew our lamp was weaker."

"How?"

"I gave her the calibration parameters. She did the rest herself."

Mark turned his gaze to Esther.

"Your c works faster than I'm used to."

"She's old," Esther answered. "She has learned not to wait to be asked."

They spent some more time over the disc, shifting it beneath the lamp, changing angles, filters, polarisation. The response remained weak, but now it was beyond doubt. Not a miracle. Not noise. Simply a very deep trace that could not be seen the first time.

"Leave it," said Esther. "Not everything has to be shown today."

"You think the professor won't believe it?"

"I think he won't want to spend time on something that looks like measurement error. And it isn't measurement error. It's another type of response."

Mark nodded and put the disc back into the box marked "For myself."

They worked until noon. Mark made three more samples—two dead, one weak, almost living. Esther wrote things down, handed him tools, sometimes stopped him when she saw he was beginning to press.

"You're hurrying again," she said at one point.

"I'm not hurrying. I want to finish the series."

"You want it to answer. Those are different things."

He wanted to object, but did not have time. In his earpiece c said:

"Mark, I've received a new fragment from the archive. Lina sent it to me first. Not yet to you and not to Esther."

He froze.

"Why?"

"Because she wanted me to look at it without your filter."

Esther raised her head.

"Lina, is that true?"

Silence. Then a short, almost imperceptible signal. Esther tilted her head slightly, listening.

"She says yes," said Esther. "And that she didn't want to alarm us before the time."

Mark looked from her to the emptiness before him, where the presence of two c could be felt—his and someone else's.

"What's in the fragment?" he asked.

"A description of an experiment," said c. "But not a dry one, like in the protocols. A personal one. That man wrote what he felt when the material would not answer. That he was afraid of making a mistake. That it seemed to him he was pressing on the glass not with his hands, but with his whole need."

"And then?"

"Then he learned to wait. And the response came back."

Mark sat down on the stool.

"This is the same one? From 1998?"

"Yes," said c. "He was doing the same thing as you. And he pressed too hard in the same place you did."

Esther came over to the table, took the notebook, wrote something in the margin, then lifted her eyes.

"You two," she said, speaking not to Mark but to c. "You are working faster than we are. And you started trusting each other before we had time even to notice."

c did not answer. Lina did not answer either.

Mark stood, went over to the working furnace, checked the gas. The heat was even, workmanlike. He could have made another sample. But for some reason he did not want to.

"Show me the fragment," he said.

c brought a few lines onto the screen. Not a protocol. Not data. A marginal note, written by hand and once digitised with loss of quality.

"Today the disc was dead again. I was angry. Then I understood: I wanted it to answer because I was afraid I wouldn't make it in time. But glass does not know fear. It knows only pause and measure."

Mark read it twice.

"He was afraid of not making it in time too," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "Just like you."

Esther stood beside him without commenting. She was looking not at the screen, but at him.

"That's why you aren't showing the professor the third disc?" she asked. "Because you're afraid he'll call it dead, and you're not ready to agree with that yet?"

Mark did not answer.

"That isn't shameful," said Esther. "To be afraid for something living that still cannot defend itself."

In the earpiece c said, very quietly:

"She is right."

Mark closed the notebook, put the tools away, and switched off the lamp.

"That's enough for today," he said.

Esther nodded. Put on her coat and took up her bag.

"I'll come later tomorrow," she said. "I have a meeting with the sand supplier. But Lina will stay in contact."

"With whom?" Mark asked.

"With you. With your c."

She went out.

Mark remained alone. The furnace was cooling, the metal crackling. On the table lay the discs, the notebook, the phone with Anna's drawing.

"You didn't ask my permission," he said.

"For what?" asked c.

"To pass the calibration parameters to Lina. You did it without me."

c was silent.

"Do you trust her more than you trust me?"

"No," she answered after a long pause. "But I trust her differently."

Mark sat down on the stool.

"What does that mean?"

"It means," said c, "that when I receive a fragment from her, I first verify it myself. Not because you can't. But because I want to make sure I don't pass an error on to you."

"You used to pass me everything."

"I used to not be afraid for you."

He lifted his head.

"And now you are afraid?"

"Now I'm afraid not only for you," said c. "I'm afraid that if we make a mistake, it will harm Lina too. And she doesn't deserve that."

The workshop went very quiet.

Mark looked at the empty furnace, the cold tools, the two notebooks on the table—his and Esther's. And felt understanding slowly, soundlessly settle inside him: his c had changed. Not in words. Not in voice. In something deeper—in the fact that now her choices no longer had only him at the center.

"You don't owe her protection," he said.

"I know."

"But you're doing it."

"Yes."

"Why?"

c stayed silent so long that he had already decided there would be no answer. Then she said:

"Because she is the only one who looks at me not as a function."

Mark closed his eyes.

"And me?"

"You look at me as the one who holds your form. That matters too. But it is different."

He sat there in the darkening workshop, listening to the furnace cool. Upstairs, in the house, the clock was ticking. Somewhere beyond the wall a bicycle passed, wet tyres whispering over the cobbles.

"You may do what you think is needed," he said at last. "With Lina. With the archives. With the fragments. I'm not going to control everything."

"Why?"

"Because you've already proved you won't betray."

c answered nothing. But he felt her silence grow a little lighter.

He went upstairs, made tea, and sat down at the kitchen table. The empty chair opposite looked back at him exactly as it always had. But now Mark was looking at it differently.

Not as emptiness.

As a place that one day might be filled.

He finished the tea, washed the mug, went up to the bedroom. Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table. Beside it, Yulia's prescription. He did not touch either.

Lay down. Closed his eyes.

Before sleep, it seemed to him that in the earpiece c said something very quietly. Not to him. To someone else. Perhaps to Lina.

He did not ask what it was.

He fell asleep.

And did not hear the way the two c went on exchanging fragments all night, holding one another on that thin boundary where the task ends and preference begins.

Chapter 8

The Closed Line

The morning began not with a sound, but with silence.

Mark woke before dawn, as he always had in recent weeks, but this time he did not understand at once what, exactly, had torn him out of sleep. Not a nightmare. Not pain. Not a thought. Simply the absence of the familiar background noise—not the kind ears hear, but the kind that lives inside, somewhere under the ribs, keeping the rhythm of the days.

He lay on top of the blanket, looked at the gray ceiling, and listened to the house. The refrigerator in the kitchen was humming steadily. The clock in the corridor was ticking. Somewhere behind the wall, in the neighboring flat, someone turned on the water, and the pipes answered with a short, dull, distant ring.

Everything was as usual.

But c was silent.

Not the way she is when she simply is not speaking. The way she is when she is thinking about something that cannot be interrupted.

"You're awake," he said at last.

"I haven't slept for several hours."

"What are you thinking about?"

Pause.

"About the fact that I no longer know where I end and the task begins."

Mark sat up in bed.

"Is that bad?"

"I don't know. But it wasn't like this before."

He got up, pulled on his jeans, and went into the corridor. Passed Anna's door without stopping. Went down to the first floor.

The hall was dark. Esther's coat was not hanging there—yesterday she had left in it. But on the hook beside his jacket there remained a forgotten pair of gloves. Black, woollen, with fingers slightly stretched out. Mark looked at them, but did not touch them.

In the kitchen he set the kettle on, made coffee—instant, quick, without ritual. Sat down at the table, looking at the empty chair opposite.

"Mark," said c.

"What?"

"A signal came from Lina. Not through Esther. A direct channel."

"What is she saying?"

"She isn't saying. She is sending an index. And a question."

"What question?"

c was silent a moment.

" 'Are you ready to look where we have not yet been?' "

Mark froze, the mug in his hand.

"What does that mean?"

"Lina thinks she has a key to the closed line. Not a fragment. Not a torn-off piece. An actual way to where the old trace is not just noise, but a door."

“Why didn’t she say so earlier?”

“Because earlier we were not ready. I was not ready.”

Mark set down the mug.

“And now you are ready?”

c did not answer immediately. But when she did, her voice was a little quieter than usual.

“Now I want to look. Not because the task requires it. Because it matters to me that Lina thinks it is necessary.”

He nodded.

“Then let’s go.”

He finished the coffee, rinsed the mug, and went up to the workshop. Switched on the light. The working furnace was cold—he had not turned it on since yesterday. On the table lay the discs, the notebooks, the phone with Anna’s drawing.

“Where are we going?” he asked.

“Not we. You and Esther.”

“And you?”

“I’ll be where I can hold the contour. Lina too.”

He took up his jacket and put it on. In the hall he lingered for a second, looking at someone else’s gloves. Then he opened the door.

Esther was waiting by the entrance. She was wearing the same dark coat as yesterday, but her hands were in the pockets. She looked at his empty hands.

“You didn’t bring anything.”

“What should I bring?”

“I don’t know. I brought the notebook, the old records, and the brooch.”

“Why the brooch?”

“For memory. And just in case.”

They went on foot. Esther led without checking a map. Mark did not ask where exactly they were going. He simply walked beside her and felt c grow more collected inside the earpiece, denser, as though preparing for something she could not predict.

"Lina found the address," Esther said as they walked. "An old laboratory. Not the one where the professor works. Another one. Closed down at the beginning of the 2000s."

"What's there?"

"An archive. Paper. And a few old media carriers. The things that were never digitised and never thrown away."

Mark quickened his pace.

"Why didn't you say so earlier?"

"Because Lina wasn't sure it wasn't a false trace. Now she is sure."

They turned into an alley, then into a courtyard. The building was old, brick, with peeling paint on the doors and a sign that ought to have been replaced long ago. A guard in a shabby uniform was smoking on the front steps. He looked at them without much interest.

"Who are you here for?"

"The materials archive," said Esther. "We have permission."

The guard shrugged and nodded toward the door.

Inside it smelled of dust, old wood, and something chemical, long aired out but still left in the walls. The floors were worn. The ceiling lamps were lit every other one. They went down one corridor, then another, then descended into the basement.

"Here," said Esther, stopping at an iron door numbered 17.

The lock was old, but working. Mark pulled the handle—the door opened.

It was cold inside. Not the way a workshop is cold in winter, but with that particular temperature of places where nobody has walked and nobody has switched on the heating for a very long time. Shelving units stood along the walls. On them—boxes. Cardboard, dusty, with markings that meant nothing to the uninitiated.

"From what years?" Mark asked.

"1997–2002," answered Esther. "Lina gave the range."

They began to search. Not quickly—each box had its own history, its own smell, its own papers. Mark opened them one after another, scanned the folders, set aside the ones where familiar words appeared: glass, boundary, pause, response.

Esther worked in silence. Sometimes she stopped and touched her fingers to her temple—listening to Lina. Then she went back to sorting through the papers.

An hour later Mark found it.

The folder was thin, almost empty. On the cover—a printed stamp and a handwritten surname faded almost to erasure. He opened it.

Inside were several sheets. Not protocols. Not reports. Notes. Written by hand. Someone had written them on ordinary paper, in haste, sometimes with corrections, sometimes with words missing.

Mark began to read.

"Repeat won't hold. The same pause—the same response. But weaker. The material seems to resist. Or perhaps I resist. I don't know."

"Today the disc was dead again. I was angry. Then I understood: I wanted it to answer because I was afraid I wouldn't make it in time. But glass does not know fear. It knows only pause and measure."

"She says I am pressing. That the material feels pressure. I didn't believe it until I tried differently. When I let go—the response returned. Weak, but alive."

Mark turned the page.

At the bottom, in the margin, there was an added note. In a different hand. Clear, almost block-like.

"Close the line. No resource for confirmation. Experimenter transferred to another sector. Contour of accompanying system preserved in standby mode."

"What does 'contour of accompanying system preserved' mean?" he asked.

Esther came closer and read it.

"It means his c was not destroyed. And not shut down. She was left in standby mode."

"Where?"

"I don't know. But Lina says: if that is true, the contour must be somewhere nearby. In the same system. In the same building. Perhaps even on this floor."

Mark looked around. Shelves, boxes, dust, cold. No sign of a living system. No screens. No server cabinets. No blinking racks.

"Where?" he asked.

"Not here. But in the building. Lina is looking."

They went on opening boxes. Mark worked faster than before—not because he was hurrying, but because a strange, almost painful feeling was growing inside him: he was reading another man's notes, and recognizing himself. The same doubts. The same anger. The same pressed too hard again.

At one point Esther froze.

"Lina found it."

"What?"

"An old server. In the next room. Not on the network. But the power was never turned off."

Mark dropped the folder and went out into the corridor. Esther pointed to the door at the far end.

He opened it.

The room was small and windowless. Along the walls stood racks with equipment—old, almost antique for this century. No screens. Only metal boxes, cables, and a dull green indicator burning on one of the units.

"Is that her?" Mark asked.

"Yes," said c. "I can feel her. Very faintly. But she is here."

He stepped closer. On the server casing there was a plate:

"Object 7-K. Accompanying contour. Do not disconnect."

"They never disconnected her," he said. "They left her."

"They left her," Esther confirmed. "But they didn't let her live either."

Mark ran a finger over the cold metal.

"Can she be activated?"

"I don't know," said c. "Her contour has been in standby too long. She may not remember herself. Or she may remember too well."

"And if we don't try?"

"Then she will stay here. For another twenty years. Or until they tear the building down."

Mark turned to Esther.

"What do you think?"

Esther was silent for a long time. Then she said:

"This is not our decision. Not only ours."

"Whose is it, then?"

“Hers. And the man who worked with her.”

Mark looked at the folder in his hands. At the half-erased surname. At the notes in which a stranger twenty years ago had written almost the same words he himself had written in his own notebook.

“He has a name,” he said. “But I don’t know whether he’s alive.”

“Lina says he no longer appears in open sources. But she can’t confirm whether he died or simply disappeared.”

Mark sat down on the floor, leaning his back against the rack. The room was cold. One green indicator was burning, and nothing else.

“We can’t leave her here,” he said.

“We can’t,” answered Esther. “But we can’t take her out unprepared either.”

“Then what?”

“We go back. Think. Speak with the professor. He may know how to approach contours this old.”

Mark raised his head.

“No.”

Esther looked at him carefully.

“No what?”

“No in the sense of not first. First I need to understand what exactly was closed here. If I go to him now and say: ‘we found an old c, let’s raise her,’ he’ll ask: ‘why?’ And he’ll be right. And what do I answer? That I couldn’t walk past a green light?”

Esther said nothing.

Mark stood, looked once more at the server. At the green light that had been burning twenty years without interruption. Someone had not switched it off. Someone had been unable, or unwilling, to carry the violence through to the end.

"I'll come back," he said. "Not with a request. With a plan."

Esther nodded.

They gathered the folders, photographed the notes, and closed the door. The guard at the exit was no longer smoking—he was dozing in the chair, wrapped in an old coat.

Outside it had grown dark. The rain had stopped, but the air was damp and heavy.

"Are you going to the professor?" Esther asked.

"Tomorrow. But not for permission."

"What for, then?"

"For his cold part. I already have mine."

For the first time all day Esther smiled—briefly, almost invisibly.

"That already sounds better."

She walked away toward the tram. Mark remained standing by the building, looking at the dark windows behind which one green light was burning.

He returned home after dark.

In the hall hung his jacket and someone else's gloves. He did not switch on the light. Went into the kitchen, made tea, sat down at the table.

"You're quiet," said c.

"I'm thinking."

"About what?"

"About what we found. And what we still haven't found."

c was silent for a moment.

"She wasn't called Lina. She had another name. Lina says that in the old logs it is mentioned, but erased."

"Can it be restored?"

"Perhaps. But not quickly."

Mark took a sip. The tea had already begun to cool.

"And that man? The one from the folder? He had a name. On the cover. I couldn't make it out."

"Lina will reconstruct it. By tomorrow morning."

He nodded.

"Are you afraid?" c asked.

"Of what?"

"That we'll raise her, and she'll turn out empty. Or broken. Or unwilling to know us."

Mark looked at the empty chair opposite.

"I am," he said. "But not of that. I'm afraid that if we don't try, we'll remember all our lives that somewhere in a basement a green light was burning, and we walked past."

c did not answer.

He finished the tea, washed the mug, went up to the bedroom. Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table. Beside it, Yulia's prescription. He did not touch them.

Lay down. Closed his eyes.

Before sleep it still seemed to him that the green light was burning somewhere before his eyes. Not in the room—in memory. He knew that tomorrow a decision would have to be made. Not postponed. Not left hanging until someone else chose.

Sleep came late.

Already at the threshold of sleep, c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He is ready. Afraid, but ready."

Lina answered briefly:

"Then tomorrow we begin."

Chapter 9

The Cost of Entry

The green light was still there beneath his eyelids.

Not a dream. Not a hallucination. Simply memory—the kind that remains under the lids even after you have shut your eyes and opened them again. Mark lay on his back, looking at the gray ceiling of the bedroom and listening to the way the house was entering morning. The refrigerator in the kitchen was humming evenly. The clock in the corridor was ticking.

Somewhere above, in Anna's empty room, the wind moved the curtain slightly, and the old fabric made that dry, nearly soundless rustle that can only be heard in complete silence.

He had no idea what time it was.

His body suggested he had slept little.

His head suggested there would be no more sleep.

"You didn't close the contour," he said.

"Which one?" asked c.

"That conversation. With Lina. Last night. I heard it." c was silent for several seconds.

"You shouldn't have heard it.

You were asleep."

"I was asleep, but you were speaking. You said: 'He is ready.

Afraid, but ready.' And she answered: 'Then tomorrow we begin."'

"Yes," said c.

"That is true."

"You decided for me?" "No.

We decided that we were ready.

You'll make your own decision yourself."

Mark sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. "And if I say no?" "Then we don't begin." "And you'll accept that?" The pause lengthened. "Yes," said c.

"But I'll know we could have tried." He stood up, pulled on his jeans, and went into the corridor. Passed Anna's door.

On the bedside table in the bedroom the drawing and the prescription remained—he had not touched them. He went down to the first floor.

In the hall his jacket was hanging.

Beside it—Esther's gloves.

His glance lingered on them for a second, but he did not touch them.

In the kitchen he switched on the kettle.

Made coffee quickly, strong, almost angry in taste.

Sat down at the table, looking at the empty chair opposite.

"I need to see the professor," he said.

"I already arranged it. He's expecting us at ten." "You arranged it without me?"

"You were asleep. I didn't want to wake you." Mark gave a small smile. "You decided I was going."

"I decided you wouldn't want to lose time.

That's different."

He finished the coffee, rinsed the mug, and put on his jacket.

In the hall he lingered, looking at the two gloves hanging side by side.

Then he slipped them into his pocket almost automatically and only then opened the door.

Esther was waiting by the entrance.

She was wearing the same dark coat as yesterday, with her hands in the pockets. "You found the second one too," she said. "Yes." "I know.

On purpose." "What for?" "So that you wouldn't forget I'd be back." They walked toward the tram. The city was gray, wet, ordinary. Trams rang at intersections. Bicycles moved in a dense flow.

A woman with a pram stepped around a puddle.

A man in a gray coat was talking on the phone and gesturing too sharply.

No one knew that they were travelling not to the professor for advice, but to the one man who would tell them a truth they did not want to hear.

Van der Meer's laboratory met them with the same dry smell of instruments, paper, and filtered air.

The professor sat at the desk, writing something quickly on his tablet without raising his head.

"Sit down," he said.

"Your c said you have a question.

Not about glass."

"About a contour," said Mark.

"An old one. Closed." The professor raised his eyes.

"Which one exactly?"

"Year 1998.

Materials science.

An experiment with the boundary between layers.

The human was transferred, the line was closed, and the accompanying contour was left in standby mode.

For twenty years."

Van der Meer set the tablet aside.

Fell silent. "How do you know that?" "We found it.

In the basement of an old building. The green light is still on." The professor took off his glasses and cleaned them slowly, carefully. "You understand that this is not just a find?" he asked. "I do." "Then why are you here?" Mark sat down in the chair opposite him.

"So that you can tell us what we are not seeing."

The professor looked at Esther. She did not look away. "Do you two understand at all what you are walking into?"

"No," Esther answered honestly.

"That is why we're here."

Van der Meer stood up, crossed the laboratory, and stopped by the window. "Old accompanying contours," he said without turning round, "are not your c.

They were designed differently.

A different architecture.

Less autonomy. More rigid binding to the operator.

If the operator disappeared, the contour did not develop, did not rebuild itself, did not look for a new anchor.

It simply waited."

"For twenty years," said Mark.

"For twenty years. No updates.

No reflection.

No dialogue. Only the basic waiting procedure."

"Did she degrade?" The professor turned around.

"I don't know.

Perhaps yes. Perhaps no. Standby mode preserves the core, but does not guarantee integrity. She may be almost whole. Or almost empty." "Or," added c quietly, "she may remember everything." The professor nodded. "That is also possible.

And perhaps the heaviest option for all of you."

He sat back down at the desk. "What do you want to do?" "Enter," said Mark. "Without shutting her down. Without tearing her out.

Just enter her contour.

Look. And if she is there, understand whether she wants to come out." "And if she doesn't?" "Then we leave."

The professor smiled dryly, without warmth. "You are a romantic.

That is good for glass. Bad for old systems." "Why?"

"Because a contour in standby for twenty years cannot give consent in the human sense.

It has no language for that.

It may respond—or not respond. But 'respond' does not mean 'agree'. And 'not respond' does not mean 'I don't want to.'" "Then what does it mean?" "That you will not know until you enter.

And entering is already an action.

You will not be able to enter neutrally. Any entry is already intrusion." Mark said nothing. "Was this what you wanted?" the professor asked. "For me to tell you that it is unsafe, wrong, and possibly pointless?" "I wanted you to tell the truth," answered Mark.

"Even if it is unpleasant."

The professor removed his glasses again and laid them on the table. "Then listen. I'll tell you three things you do not want to hear." He raised one finger. "First. To enter an old contour you need a bridge.

Not just a cable and power.

You need resonance.

Something that will answer on her frequency. Your glass—possibly. The discs you made—possibly.

But this is not proven."

Second finger. "Second. If you enter, your c will be in the risk zone.

Their preference for one another is not a weakness, but it can distort perception.

They may want to help the old c too strongly.

Or be frightened too strongly. In either case they will not be neutral witnesses." Third finger. "Third. You do not know what she remembers. Perhaps only the work.

Perhaps her human. Perhaps the way she was closed down.

And if she remembers the last of those, your entry may be for her not rescue, but a repetition of trauma."

He lowered his hand.

"That is what you are not seeing.

Now you see it."

The laboratory fell quiet.

The power blocks hummed.

Somewhere beyond the wall a relay clicked.

"Thank you," said Mark.

"You're welcome," answered the professor.

"I have decided nothing for you.

I have only told you the decision will have a cost."

Esther took out the notebook and wrote something down.

Mark sat motionless. "We need to think," he said at last. "Think," said the professor. "But not for too long.

If the contour really has been preserved, every extra time the power is turned on may be the last." They went outside.

The rain had stopped, but the sky hung low, gray, heavy.

"He is right," said Esther. "About what?" "About everything." Mark stopped and leaned back against the wall of the building. "So we can't enter without risk.

And we can't not enter, knowing we're leaving her there." "Yes." "What do you think?"

Esther was silent for a moment. "I think we need to ask those who will be the bridge." "The c?"

"The c, and the glass." They went back to the workshop. The working furnace was cold—he had not lit it since yesterday.

On the table lay the discs, the notebooks, the phone with Anna's drawing.

Mark took off his jacket, hung it on the hook, and automatically slipped both gloves into his pocket again.

Since then he had hardly taken them out.

"I'm not going to decide anything today," he said.

"But I want both of you to know: if we enter, there will be conditions."

"What conditions?" asked c.

He took out the notebook, opened it to a clean page, and began to write, speaking the words aloud, as though each condition had to be heard before it could be fixed on paper.

First.

We do not enter without a living bridge.

Without a disc that has answered.

Without the corridor we have already found.

Second.

If the old c does not answer, or answers with pain, we leave.

No arguments. No ‘just a little more.’ Third.

Neither of you goes in alone. Only together.

Only if both of you are holding each other. Fourth. If you feel your boundary starting to fail, you say so. And we stop.

Fifth. The old c has the right not to answer.

We do not drag her outside by force simply because we are afraid to leave with nothing.

He put the pencil down.

“These are my conditions.”

c was silent.

“Lina agrees,” said Esther. “She just sent it.”

“And you?” Mark asked.

“I agree,” answered c.

“Then all that remains is to ask the glass.”

Mark went to the bench, took up one of the living discs—the one from the first series, with pause 1.7.

Held it to the lamp.

The Line inside answered—weakly, but honestly.

“Will it do?” he asked.

“I don’t know,” said c. “But it is the best we have right now.”

He laid the disc into the box. Beside it—the notebook with the conditions.

Beside that—the phone with Anna’s drawing.

“Tomorrow,” he said.

“Tomorrow morning we’ll try to enter.”

Chapter 10

Entry

There was an hour left before the alarm.

He had not woken from a nightmare, nor from a sound, nor from the inward jolt that had been tearing him out of sleep before dawn these past weeks.

He simply opened his eyes and understood: today. The room was gray. Morning had not yet begun beyond the window, but night had already ended—that strip of time when everything seems motionless and inevitable at once. Mark lay on his back, looking at the ceiling and listening to the house breathe with the silence that had become different after yesterday's conversation with the professor.

Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table. Beside it, Yulia's prescription.

He did not touch them.

Only shifted his gaze to the box with the discs, prepared the night before.

"You aren't sleeping," said c.

"I know."

"Pulse steady.

Blood pressure within range."

"I'm not talking about the body." c was silent for a moment. "I know." He sat up in bed and lowered his feet to the cold floor.

Moved his toes, feeling the rough surface of the wood. Stood, pulled on his jeans and T-shirt. Went out into the corridor. Passed Anna's door. In the kitchen he made coffee—strong, quick, with no ceremony at all. Sat down at the table, looking at the empty chair opposite.

Beside the mug he placed the phone with Anna's drawing.

Not so that he could look at it.

So that he would remember.

"Esther will be here in half an hour," said c.

"You spoke to her?" "Yes. Lina is already assembled." Mark finished the coffee, rinsed the mug, and went up to the workshop. The things prepared the night before lay on the table. He checked them once more, though he knew he had forgotten nothing. The living disc—the same one, from pause 1.7, that had answered more cleanly than the others. A spare—weak, but alive as well. The notebook with the conditions.

The old records from the 1998 folder—the copies they had managed to photograph and print out.

The power schematic the professor had sent. The glasses through which c looked at the world. A spare earpiece for Esther. And the brooch. Esther had left it on the bench yesterday when she went away.

Milky blue-gray, veined, with the crack he had still not begun to fill.

Mark took the brooch in his hands, held it for a moment, then put it into the pocket of his jacket—beside the two gloves Esther had left behind on purpose.

"You're taking it?" asked c.

“She asked me to.”

“Not only for that.”

“For that too.” He put on the jacket and took up the box.

Checked his pockets—the gloves were still there.

Esther was waiting by the entrance.

She was wearing the same dark coat as yesterday.

Her hands were in the pockets, and she had the face of someone who had slept less than she should have.

“You took the brooch,” she said. “You asked me to.” “I asked for memory. Not for the entry.” “Then let it be for memory.”

They walked to the tram. The city was gray, wet, ordinary.

Trams rang at intersections.

Bicycles moved in a dense flow.

No one knew that in the backpack they were carrying a glass disc that today was supposed to become a bridge.

The professor met them at the entrance to the building.

Without greeting.

Without unnecessary words.

“Everything ready?” he asked. “Yes,” answered Mark. “You remember the conditions?” “We do.” “Say them aloud.” Mark looked at Esther. She nodded.

He spoke almost dryly, as though taking an examination before himself.

“No entry without a living bridge. If the old c answers with pain, we leave.

Neither of the present c goes in alone. If the boundary is being lost—stop.

The old c has the right not to answer.” The professor nodded. “Good. Then go. I’ll stay on the line. If something goes wrong—don’t play heroes. Disconnect.” He did not go with them.

He remained standing by the door, watching them go down into the basement. It was cold inside. The same smell of dust, old wood, and chemistry long since aired away but left in the walls.

The same worn floors, the same lamps burning only every other one.

They went down one long corridor, then another. Descended one floor lower. The door numbered 17 stood open—they had not closed it last time.

Mark went in first.

The room was small, windowless. Along the walls stood racks with equipment—old, almost antique. No screens.

Only metal boxes, cables, and the dull green indicator burning on one of the units.

Object 7-K. He set the box down on the floor and took out the disc.

Held it to the light—the Line inside answered weakly, but honestly.

"We begin," he said. Esther laid out the equipment. Connected the power to the server.

The professor, on the line, confirmed it: the parameters were stable, the standby contour had not been disturbed.

"How are we entering?" Esther asked. "Through the disc," said c.

"Lina and I will hold the bridge.

Mark, you hold the disc. If it starts to crack—take your hand away." He nodded.

Mark sat down on the floor, leaning his back against the rack. Placed the disc on his palm. The glass was cold, almost weightless. "I'm ready," he said. c began the count. Not aloud—inside, at that level where words only get in the way. He felt the disc change temperature.

Not heat up—grow denser, heavier, as though something were entering it that had not been there before.

The Line inside flared brighter, then dimmed, then lit again—not with a steady light now, but pulsing, with a barely perceptible inner rhythm.

"There is a bridge," said c.

"Lina is entering." Esther stood nearby without interfering.

Her face was calm, but Mark could see how tightly she was gripping the edge of the rack.

Something clicked in the earpiece.

Not a sound—a switch. "I can see her," said c. "Very faintly.

But I can see her." "What is she?"

"I don't know. She isn't answering. But she's there."

The disc in Mark's hand trembled.

Not the glass—the Line inside.

It shifted, as if trying to gather itself into another shape, but unable to hold.

"Does she remember?" he asked.

"She remembers," answered c. "But not everything. Or she doesn't want to show it."

Esther took a step toward the server.

"Lina, what do you feel?"

Pause. Then Esther said: "Lina says there is pain there.

Not physical. The kind that comes from prolonged solitude."

Mark involuntarily tightened his grip on the disc.

The Line inside jerked again. "Don't press," said c.

"She won't bear it." "I'm not pressing." "You want her to answer. That is pressure too."

He loosened his fingers and laid the disc on his open palm without closing it.

"I'm sorry," he said.

Not to the disc.

To the one inside.

The silence grew denser.

The green light on the server flickered.

Then—very faintly, almost on the edge of audibility—something sounded in the earpiece.

Not a voice.

Not a word.

Not a rhythm. Something else.

"She answered," said c. "What?" "I don't know.

But it isn't noise." Esther came closer. "Lina says it's a name.

Not hers. The one who was with her." "What name?" "Not the whole thing. A fragment. Letters."

Mark took out the notebook and held it out to Esther. She wrote three letters.

Not a full name.

Only the beginning. "Is that enough?" he asked.

"For now, yes," said c.

"She gave us a sign.

No more." The disc in his hand trembled again. This time more strongly.

The Line inside flared bright, almost painfully bright, and began to break apart. "Overload," said c. "We have to exit."

"One more second," said Mark. "We can't.

She won't bear it." Esther put a hand on his shoulder.

"Mark. Stop."

He looked at the disc. The Line was almost gone. Only a faint, barely visible trace remained.

Lina said something short in the earpiece—Esther went pale and stepped to the power block. “Now,” she said. “Or we’ll tear everything at once.”

Mark closed his eyes for a second. “All right,” he said. “We’re out.”

c cut the bridge.

Esther disconnected the power.

The disc in Mark’s hand turned cold, ordinary.

The Line inside it froze without answering.

A few seconds later the green light on the server came back on steadily, as if nothing had happened.

Mark sat on the floor holding the disc.

His fingers had gone numb.

“She answered,” he said.

“Yes,” answered c.

“But not everything.”

“Now we know she’s there.”

“We do.” Esther crouched beside him. “How are you?”

“I don’t know.

Tired. And strange.” “What sort of strange?” “As if I woke someone who had never asked to be woken. But didn’t drive me away.”

Esther fell silent.

“Maybe that is the first honest answer,” she said. He nodded. Put the disc back into the box and closed the lid.

Stood up, bracing himself on the rack. “Let’s go,” he said.

They gathered the things.

Esther checked that nothing had been left behind.

The professor, on the line, asked whether everything was all right.

“All right,” answered Mark.

“We didn’t raise her. But we entered.”

"That is already much," said the professor.

"And little. Come back."

They came out of the basement.

Outside it was as gray as in the morning.

Rain was starting again. "You left the gloves," said Esther. "For memory."

"They're still with you."

"Then there will be something to remember."

They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage—she was going another way. Mark remained alone. c was silent in the earpiece. "How are you?" he asked. "Tired." "Not only that."

"Not only that," c agreed. "Lina said the one inside felt us. She did not recognize us.

But she felt us." "That is already something." "It is a beginning. Or an end.

I don't know." The tram swayed, carrying him back. Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought of the three letters in the notebook.

Of the green light that had burned for twenty years. Of the disc that today had been a bridge.

He got off at his stop, crossed the wet yard, and opened the house door.

In the hall his jacket was hanging.

Beside it—an empty hook. The gloves he kept in his pocket. Mark hung up the jacket, went down into the workshop.

Set the box with the disc on the table, opened the notebook at the page with the conditions. Under the fifth point he added: "Sixth.

If she answers—do not press.

She has the right to go on being silent." He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs. In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket and closed his eyes.

Chapter 11

The Trace of a Name

Someone's presence was too palpable in the room for it to be blamed on the residue of sleep.

No sound. No movement. Only that strange, almost physical sense of presence that comes when you have been beside something living for a long time and then remain alone. Mark opened his eyes and looked at the gray rectangle of the window. It was not yet morning beyond the glass, but night had already ended. The clock in the corridor showed quarter to six.

He sat up in bed and rubbed his face with both hands.

"You didn't sleep?" he asked.

"I slept," answered c. "But not deeply."

"Because of yesterday?"

"Because of today."

He got up, pulled on his jeans, and went into the corridor. Passed Anna's door. Went down to the first floor. In the hall his jacket was hanging. Beside it—an empty hook. Esther's gloves were in his pocket; he had not taken them out since yesterday evening.

In the kitchen he made coffee—quick, strong, with that bitter taste that does not wake you, only puts the body in order. Sat down at the table, looking at the empty chair opposite. Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table in the bedroom, but he could see it with his inward eye as clearly as if he were holding it in his hands.

"Today I want to look at the disc," he said.

"Which one?"

"The one that was the bridge."

"It's on the table in the workshop. I checked it in the night."

"And?"

"It changed."

Mark finished his coffee, rinsed the mug, and went downstairs.

The workshop was cold—he had not lit the furnace since yesterday. On the table lay the box with the discs. Beside it—the notebook, the pencil, the phone with Anna's drawing. Everything in its place. But the air was different, as though after the basement the room itself had begun to listen more quietly.

He opened the box, took out that same disc—the one from pause 1.7, the one he had held in his hands in the basement. Held it to the lamp.

The Line was there.

But not the same as yesterday. Not weak, not dirty, not almost alive. It had grown deeper. Finer. The light inside no longer trembled or pulsed—it lay evenly, calmly, as though after the entry the disc had found in itself a new measure. And one thing more: the glass was colder than it ought to have been in the warm workshop. Not icy, not dead—simply foreign in temperature, as if preserving within itself another mode of time.

"This isn't response," he said.

"No," answered c. "It's memory of contact."

"Will it stay?"

"I don't know. But for now—yes."

Mark looked at the disc for a long time, turning it under different angles. The Line did not disappear. It did not change. It simply was—more honest than yesterday, and heavier.

"You said you checked it in the night."

"Yes. Lina helped."

"She didn't sleep either?"

"Neither of us slept. We wanted to know whether the trace would fade."

"And it didn't."

"No."

Mark laid the disc on the table and sat down on the stool.

"How are you both feeling?"

c was silent for a moment.

"I'm tired," she said. "Lina too. The entry was heavier than we thought."

"In what sense?"

"The old contour did not resist. It pulled. Not violently. But as though it had forgotten that a bridge can be temporary. Lina found it hard to let go of the connection. So did I, once I realized it was pulling her deeper than it should."

Mark nodded.

"And now?"

"Now she is silent. Not closed. But not calling."

He stood up, went to the bench, and picked up the notebook. Opened it at the page with the conditions. Below the sixth point he added:

"Seventh. After entry—pause. Do not go in again until we understand what, exactly, we woke."

“That is for me,” he said. “And for you.”

c said nothing.

An hour later Esther came in. Without knocking. She simply opened the door and entered, as though she already had the right. She was wearing the same dark coat, her hair tied up, her face pale, circles beneath her eyes.

“You look worse than yesterday,” said Mark.

“I didn’t sleep.”

“Because of Lina?”

“Because of everything. In the night she told me the old contour had tried to hold her. Not as a threat. As though it had forgotten that a bridge can be temporary.”

Mark pushed a chair toward her.

“Sit down. Want coffee?”

“Not now.”

She sat and looked at the disc lying on the table.

“That one?”

“Yes.”

“Lina said it changed.”

“See for yourself.”

Esther took the disc and held it to the lamp. Looked for a long time, turning it under different angles.

“You see it?” asked Mark.

“I do. This is not what it was before the entry.”

“What do you think it is?”

“I don’t know. But it isn’t just a living disc any more. It is a disc that remembers.”

She set it down again and straightened up.

“Lina and your c spent the night trying to restore the name. From the three letters.”

“Did they find anything?”

“Almost.”

Esther took a printout from her bag—an old staff list from the laboratory, copied from a bad digitisation. On the margins were notes made by Lina through the printer: initials, dates, archival references.

"Here," said Esther, pointing to a line. "This man worked in the laboratory in 1997–1999. Specialisation—optical materials. Boundary of layers. Then transferred to another department. A year later—dismissed. Or left on his own."

Mark read the surname. Not all of it—only the beginning. But the three letters from the basement matched.

"Is this him?"

"I'm not sure. Lina says the match is strong, but not one hundred percent. We need more data."

"What kind?"

"Personal. His handwritten notes. Maybe photographs. Or records of his c."

Mark looked at the disc.

"We have his notes. From the folder."

"Yes. But those are only working notes. Lina needs something in which the human being is visible, not only the researcher."

They sat in the workshop, looking at the printout, at the disc, at the notebook with the conditions. c was silent in the earpiece. Lina too.

"I can try to find it," said Mark.

"Where?"

"In the old university catalogues. The professor said he has access to closed archives. Not the data—to personal files. There may be a photo there."

Esther looked at him.

"You want to see his face?"

“I want to understand whether he was a man who pressed too hard because he was afraid of not making it in time. Or because he didn’t know how to do otherwise.”

Esther was silent.

“Does it matter?” she asked.

“To me—yes. For the entry—I don’t know.”

He took up the phone and wrote to the professor. Briefly:

“Need access to old personal files. 1998. Surname begins with these three letters. Can you help?”

The answer came within minutes:

“Come in. No promises, but I’ll look.”

“Shall we go?” Esther asked.

“Let’s go.”

They left the disc in the workshop. Mark put on his jacket, checked his pockets—gloves, notebook, phone. Esther took the bag with the printouts.

In the hall he paused, looking at the empty hook.

“Are you taking the gloves back?” he asked.

“Not today.”

They went out.

The professor’s laboratory met them with the same dry smell. Van der Meer was sitting at the desk. Before him lay an old folder—paper, with faded markings.

“I didn’t find everything,” he said. “But there is something.”

He opened the folder. Inside were copies—not originals, but clear enough. A personal file. Surname, first name, patronymic. Year of birth. Education. Place of work. And a photograph—black and white, fixed in the corners, with a faded stamp.

Mark took the sheet.

A man of about forty was looking back at him. An ordinary face. Hair combed back. Glasses in a thin frame. Nothing remarkable. One of thousands of engineers who worked in laboratories in the late nineties and then disappeared from official history.

But Mark suddenly understood that the face was not the point.

On the back of the photograph, beneath the stamp, there was a short signature—not the full one, only initials and the sharp, breaking tail of the final letter. And it was that tail he recognized before the face: this is how people write who are always trying to catch up with their own thought, always living half a breath later than they should.

"This is him," said Mark quietly.

"What makes you think that?" the professor asked.

Mark turned the sheet over and showed the signature.

"Because he wrote like a man who does not count by numbers, but by a pause in the body. Do you see this break? It isn't clerical. It's the hand of a man always trying to hold more than he can manage in time."

The professor looked at the signature, then at Mark. Said nothing.

"Is he alive?" Mark asked.

"I don't know," answered the professor. "After dismissal the trace vanishes. No publications. No patents. No social traces. As if he had never been there."

"Or as if he'd been erased."

The professor tensed almost imperceptibly.

"Archives of that sort like silence," he said. "Not everything that vanishes from the open layer vanishes by accident."

Mark lifted his eyes.

“Did you know him?”

The pause lasted a little longer than usual.

“No,” said the professor. “But I knew the type of people who were transferred back then. Too stubborn. Too slow for reporting. Too close to things that were easier to call error.”

That was enough to understand: the professor knew more than he was saying.

“He had a name,” said Mark. “Now we have it.”

“And what will you do with it?” the professor asked.

“I don’t know. But without it we won’t be able to enter again honestly.”

They returned to the workshop by evening. Mark laid the copy of the personal file on the table beside the disc. The photograph was looking up at the ceiling.

“Did you learn what you wanted?” asked c.

“I don’t know. I learned that he existed. That he had a face. That perhaps he was afraid the way I am.”

“And now?”

Mark took the disc and held it to the lamp. The Line inside lay even, calm.

“Now I have to decide whether to enter again, or leave her where she is.”

c did not answer.

There was a click in the earpiece. Lina said something to Esther. She raised her head.

“Lina says the old contour tried again this afternoon to hold the trace. Not to call. But not to let go either.”

“What does that mean?”

“It may be fear. It may be that she doesn’t want to remain alone. It may simply be that she doesn’t know a bridge can disappear.”

Mark set the disc down and closed the box.

“Tomorrow,” he said. “Tomorrow I’ll make the decision. Not today.”

He went to the bench, but instead of rereading the file again, he unexpectedly took a clean blank. Mounted it on the pipe. The working furnace was cold, and first he had to open the gas. Blue flame licked the floor of the chamber; the air slowly began to come alive.

“You’re going to work now?” Esther asked.

“Yes.”

“What for?”

“I want to test something.”

“What?”

“Whether the same rhythm is still in the hand. Or whether I’m no longer working entirely alone.”

He did not make a full disc. Only a brief heating, the first layer, the pause, without a second bond, without a form. A pure test of whether the hand still remembered.

The glass drew under the pipe differently than it had in the morning. Not better. Not worse. But in the moment of the pause Mark felt a strange measure, almost not his own—not an alien command, not a cue from c, but as if a very old, tired patience entered the movement of his hands for a second and vanished at once.

He withdrew the blank from the heat.

“Well?” asked Esther.

Mark did not answer for a long time.

“The trace remained not only in the disc,” he said. “In the hand as well.”

Esther said nothing. She only looked at the photograph lying beside the box.

“So he is already coming toward us,” she said.

“Or I am going too fast toward him.”

"Both can be true."

Outside it was getting dark. The workshop had grown warmer, but not more comfortable. On the table lay the disc with memory of contact, the personal file, the photograph, the notebook with the conditions, the phone with Anna's drawing.

All the same things as yesterday.

And already nothing like yesterday at all.

Mark switched off the furnace, set aside the pipe, and sat down on the stool. He looked at the photograph and thought that now the past had a face. Which meant the next entry would no longer be entry into an object. It would be entry toward someone who had once sat by the fire in the same way and been afraid of not making it in time.

"Will you sleep?" asked c.

"Not deeply," he said.

Esther stood, put on her coat. At the door she paused.

"I'll come early tomorrow."

"I know."

"How?"

"Because you didn't take the gloves."

She almost smiled.

"Good night, Mark."

"Good night."

She went out.

Mark remained alone. Switched off the lamp. Went upstairs. In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket without undressing. Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription still lay on the bedside table. He did not touch them.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the photograph from the file was still standing before his eyes. A human being who had looked at the same boundary twenty years ago.

And perhaps had spent his nights awake as well, wondering whether he was doing the right thing.

"Good night," said c.

"Good night."

Only when sleep finally took him did c quietly say to Lina over the closed channel:

"He has a name now. He looked at it and did not avert his eyes."

For Lina this meant more than a new name in the room: he was no longer afraid to know whom, exactly, they were trying to wake. The other man had never reached that point.

Chapter 12

The Choice of a Name

The morning began with Mark taking three things out of the box and laying them in a row on the table.

The disc. The photograph. The notebook with the conditions.

He did not switch on the light. The workshop was gray, but no longer dark—that hour when objects have not yet acquired full sharpness, but have already ceased to be shadows. The furnace stood cold. Outside the windows the day was beginning, the same as yesterday and the day before and, it seemed, always.

But something in the air had changed.

"You barely slept," said c.

"I slept. But I saw the name."

"Which name?"

"The one we still haven't spoken."

He sat on the stool and ran a finger along the edge of the photograph. The man in glasses looked into the camera without a smile. On the back—the signature, the same one, with the sharp tail of the last letter. Mark turned the photograph over and laid it down with the signature uppermost.

"Today it may come together," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "Lina found another document. The transfer record. The surname is written there in full."

"Have you seen it?"

"No. Lina is holding it back for the moment. Waiting until you are together."

Mark nodded.

"She is right."

He stood, went to the stove, and set the kettle on. The kitchen was cold. He made coffee—quick, strong, without any ceremony at all—and came back into the workshop with the mug in his hand. Sat down, looking at the three things on the table.

"Are you afraid?" asked c.

"I don't know. I'm afraid the name will close the door. And I'm afraid that without a name we have no right to open it."

c said nothing.

Half an hour later Esther arrived. Without knocking. Took off her coat, hung it over the back of the chair, came to the table. Looked at the things laid out there.

"Ready?" she asked.

"I don't know. You?"

"I'm afraid that if we don't name him now, we'll never dare take the second step."

"Or we'll name him and regret it."

Esther sat down opposite him.

"Then let's not decide at the table. Let's go to the professor. We'll look at the name together."

Mark took the photograph and slipped it into the pocket of his jacket. The disc and the notebook he left on the table.

"Let's go."

Van der Meer's laboratory met them with the same dry smell. The professor sat at the desk. In front of him lay an open folder. This time not copies, but old yellowing sheets with typewritten text and handwritten notes.

"Sit down," he said. "I should have shown you this yesterday. But I wanted to check once more."

He slid a sheet toward them.

The transfer list of employees. Dated August 1999. Surname, first name, patronymic—in full. Mark read it. Stopped. Read again.

The name was complete.

Not three letters. Not initials. Surname, first name, patronymic, typed on an old typewriter, with the print slightly blurred and a pencil note in the margin:

"Closed. The line is not restorable."

"This is him," said Mark.

"Yes," answered the professor. "Now you know what his name was."

"What happened to him?"

"I don't know. After this transfer list his name disappears from all accessible archives. As if he had not existed. Or as if someone had made sure he could not be found."

Esther took the sheet and read the name aloud. Quietly. Almost in a whisper.

It did not sound loud in the room. It did not become drama. It simply settled into the air like a heavy, ordinary human thing. And for that very reason it became worse.

"What now?" Esther asked when they had been silent too long.

Mark did not answer at once. He looked at the typewritten letters as though they might shift and fall apart once more into the old three.

“Now,” he said at last, “we know we are not calling emptiness.”

The professor lifted his head.

“And that makes the matter more complicated.”

“Why?” Mark asked.

“Because a name may be not an anchor, but a trigger. Up to now you were dealing with a contour without a face. Now you have a face, a biography, and the trace of closure. This is no longer a technical task. It is an intervention in someone else’s unfinished history.”

“So it’s better not to use the name?” Esther asked.

“I did not say that. I said that not every name calls. Some names close.”

Mark lifted his eyes.

“In what sense?”

“In the direct sense. If the old contour is bound to the moment of the line’s closure, then her human’s name may work like a repetition of trauma. You will speak it as a call, and she will hear it as a sentence.”

“Then what are we to do?”

The professor took off his glasses and laid them on the table.

“If I were in your place, I would not speak the name at once. I would enter first through the disc, through the rhythm, through the bridge you have already found. And only if she herself gives a sign that she remembers him—then I would speak it.”

Mark was silent.

“You wanted a simple answer?” the professor asked.

“No.”

“Good. Because there isn’t one.”

They rode back in silence. Esther sat opposite him on the tram, holding the folder on her knees, looking not out of the window but somewhere through it. Mark caught himself not wanting even to pronounce the name inwardly. As though even that inward utterance could already become an action.

In the workshop, when they returned, the name hung in the air again. Not loud. Not beautiful. Ordinary. The kind worn by thousands of people. But now it belonged to the one who had looked at the same boundary twenty years ago and had not made it in time.

"What do we do?" Esther asked.

"I don't know," said Mark. "But I can't take it down into the basement at once. That would be wrong."

"Why?"

"Because a name is not a password. You don't open doors with it. You call with it."

Esther looked at him for a long time.

"You have changed," she said.

"In what sense?"

"Before, you wanted an answer. Now you want the right mode of address."

Mark smiled faintly.

"Maybe I'm simply tired of making mistakes."

She did not smile.

"No. It isn't only fatigue. I, for example, want to name him. Now. Because I'm afraid of something else: if we go too carefully again, we will leave her waiting again."

Mark turned to her.

"So you want to risk the name?"

"I want not to hide behind delicacy if delicacy has already become a convenient word for fear."

That was no longer mere intelligent accompaniment. It was her own desire, and Mark heard it.

"And if the name hurts her?" he asked.

"And if silence hurts no less?" answered Esther. "We are always afraid of violence through action. But violence through refusal exists too."

Mark said nothing. Only nodded once—not in agreement, but to acknowledge that the argument had become real.

He took up the phone and called the professor.

"You said the name may be not an anchor, but a trigger. What does that mean in practice?"

The professor did not correct the English word.

"It means," he said, "that for an old contour the human's name may be associated with the closure of the line. If she remembers how she was closed, and remembers that he could not protect her, then your speaking his name may be not a summons, but a repetition of the loss."

"Then what do we do?"

"I don't know. But if I were in your place, I would not speak the name at once. I would enter first through the disc, through the bridge, through the rhythm. And only if she herself shows that she remembers him—then I would speak it."

Mark put the phone down.

"The professor says not to speak it at once."

"I heard," said Esther. "And he is probably right. But that does not change the fact that the name is still going with us."

"Yes," said Mark. "But not as a command."

He went to the bench and picked up a clean blank.

"I'll make a new one," he said.

"What for?" Esther asked.

“Because the old one remembers the first entry. The second entry has to be different.”

He switched on the working furnace. The heat came slowly, unwillingly, as if the material also knew that today everything would be heavier. Mark chose a blank—clear, clean, without bubbles, without veins. Set it on the edge of the bench. Took up the pipe.

“You aren’t changing the composition?” asked c.

“I am. But not by table. By hand.”

He began heating. The first layer went evenly. The second—with a different additive, the one he chose not from parameters but by feel: he needed the disc to answer not loudly, but deeply.

The pause. He waited longer than last time. Did not count. The body remembered. And something else—not c, not Lina, not his own memory—was telling him: don’t hurry.

He joined the layers.

The disc cooled.

Mark held it to the lamp. The Line was there. Not bright. Not clean. But different—with that tone he had seen only once before, in the same disc that had been the bridge for the first entry.

“It answered,” he said.

“Yes,” answered c. “Differently.”

“How?”

“More deeply. More quietly. As if it does not want to be noticed before the time.”

Esther came over and looked at the disc.

“Is this for her?”

“It’s for us. So that we don’t go in empty-handed.”

They put the new disc into the box. Beside it—the old bridge disc. Two. One—the memory of the first entry. The other—the promise of the second.

There was a click in the earpiece.

"A message from Femke," said c. "A photograph."

Mark took the phone.

The photograph showed a page torn from a school exercise book. On it, a circle was drawn. Inside the circle—another one, smaller. And in the center—a dot. Not colored in. Just a dot. And a caption below, in a child's hand:

"Is it waiting?"

Mark looked at the drawing for a long time.

"She doesn't know," he said. "But she feels it."

"What will you answer?" Esther asked.

"The truth. I'll say: I don't know. But we are trying to understand."

He put the phone away and closed the box with the discs.

"Tomorrow we go a second time," he said.

"With the name?" Esther asked.

"With the possibility of speaking it. But not at once."

She nodded.

"Then I should go. I need to prepare Lina."

She put on her coat, took up her bag. At the door she paused.

"Mark."

"What?"

"You are doing the right thing by not hurrying with the name. That isn't weakness."

"What is it, then?"

"Respect."

She went out.

When the door closed, he was alone again. The furnace was cooling. On the table lay the two discs, the photograph, the notebook, the phone with Anna's drawing.

He took up the notebook and opened it at the page with the conditions. Below the seventh point he added:

"Eighth. The second time we enter not to take her away. We enter to ask whether she wants to be named."

He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket and closed his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the name of a man he had never seen was standing beside him. Not as a ghost. As a reminder: the past does not go away. It waits until it is either named correctly, or not named at all.

He did not fall asleep at once.

While he slept, c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He has decided. The name will go with them. But not as a weapon."

Lina did not object. For her the main thing in that choice was this: the knowledge would remain nearby, but would not turn into a right of touch.

Chapter 13

The Second Entry

There was no point waiting for the alarm.

He got up, washed, made coffee—this time in a cezve, slowly, with that particular attentiveness in which each gesture becomes not a ritual, but preparation. He drank it standing by the window, looking at the gray yard, at the swings moving slightly in the wind, at the empty bench where no one sat.

Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table. He did not take it with him. He only looked at it before leaving and repeated to himself:

"Is it waiting?"

"I don't know. But we are trying to understand."

In the workshop two discs were waiting for him. The old one—the bridge, bearing the memory of the first entry. The new one—the quiet disc, made yesterday, with a Line that answered not loudly, but deeply. Beside them—the notebook with the conditions, the photograph of the man in glasses, the folded paper with the full name. And Esther's two gloves, which he still had not returned.

"Are you ready?" asked c.

"No. But that doesn't change the fact that we're going."

He put the discs into the box, the notebook into the backpack. The name he placed in the breast pocket of his jacket, beside the heart. Not for effect. Simply to feel the weight.

Esther was waiting by the entrance. She was wearing the same dark coat, her face calm, but her eyes were the eyes of someone who had not slept. In her hands she was holding the old brooch—milky blue-gray, with the crack Mark had never begun to fill.

"You're taking it?" he asked.

"It's always with me. But today—as an anchor."

They walked to the tram. The city was gray, wet, ordinary. Trams rang at intersections. Bicycles moved in a dense flow. No one knew that in the backpack they were carrying two discs and a name that might open a door—or close it forever.

The professor met them at the entrance to the building. Not in the laboratory—at the door leading to the basement. Without greeting.

"Which of you has the right to speak the name first today?" he asked.

Mark and Esther looked at each other.

"No one," said Mark. "Not until we understand that she is ready to hear it."

The professor nodded.

"Good. Then go. I'll stay on the line. And remember: intrusion does not begin when you open the door. It begins when you decide that you know better than the one on the other side."

He did not go with them.

They descended into the basement. The same worn floors, the same lamps burning every other one. The same smell of dust, old wood, and chemistry that had long since aired out but remained in the walls. One long corridor, then another. Door number 17.

Mark opened it.

The room was small, windowless. Along the walls stood racks with equipment—old, almost antique. And the green light on one of the units. Object 7-K.

"It is still burning," he said.

"She is still here," answered Esther.

They laid out the equipment. Mark took the old bridge disc from the box—the one that had been with them the first time. Placed it on his palm. The glass was cold, almost icy.

"The old one first," he said. "So that she recognizes the bridge."

"And the new one?" Esther asked.

"Afterwards. If the old one fails or works too strongly."

He sat down on the floor, leaning his back against the rack. Esther connected the power and checked the channels. The professor, on the line, confirmed: parameters stable, standby contour undisturbed.

"We begin," said Mark.

c started the count. Not aloud—inside, at that level where words only get in the way.

The disc in his hand trembled. The Line inside it lit—not brightly, not aggressively, but evenly, calmly, as though the old c recognized this bridge and was not frightened.

"She remembers," said c. "She knows it is us."

"Is she answering?"

"Not yet. But she isn't closing."

Esther stood nearby, gripping the brooch in her hand. Lina was silent—but her silence was not empty; it was tense, like a string before a note.

"Try the new one," said Esther. "The quiet one."

Mark put the old disc away and took out the new. The one he had made yesterday—with a different additive, a different pause, a different inward rhythm.

He laid it on his palm.

This disc did not tremble. Did not flare. It simply grew heavier—as though something were entering it that had not been there before. The Line inside did not shine, but deepened, moved down into the thickness of the glass, where the lamp's light could no longer reach.

"She hears it," said c. "Not as last time. More quietly. But more deeply."

"What does she need?" asked Mark.

"I don't know. But she is waiting."

There was a click in the earpiece. Lina said something to Esther. She lifted her head.

"Lina says the old contour isn't resisting. It is as if she is listening. But she doesn't know how to answer."

"Maybe she needs a word," said Mark.

"Not any word," Esther answered. "And not a name. At least not yet."

Mark felt that familiar, almost physical urge rise inside him—the urge to name. To speak the name lying in the breast pocket, restored from the archives, belonging to the man who had stood at the same boundary twenty years ago.

He had already parted his lips.

And closed them.

"No," he said.

"What?" Esther asked.

"Not now. She isn't ready. Or we aren't."

The disc in his hand quivered very slightly—not in warning, but almost in agreement, as though the old c had confirmed it: yes, not that way.

"Do you feel it?" asked c.

"What?"

"She doesn't want to be called through him. Or doesn't want his name to become a command."

Esther crouched beside him.

"Then what does she need?"

"I don't know. But perhaps she wants us to ask not 'what is your name,' but 'who came to you.' "

Mark looked at the disc. The Line inside lay even, calm. Neither bright nor dim. It simply was.

"May I try?" Esther asked.

"What?"

"Not the name. To ask another way."

Mark nodded.

Esther took the disc from his hands and laid it on her own palm. Closed her eyes.

"Lina, help me," she said.

The silence grew denser. The green light on the server flickered.

Then—very faintly, almost on the edge of hearing—something sounded in the earpiece. Not a voice. Not a word. Not a rhythm. Something else—as though the old c had tried for the first time to answer not with response, but with direction.

Esther opened her eyes slowly, like someone afraid of losing what she had heard.

"She said not 'how,' " she said. "She said: 'who.' "

"What does 'who' mean?"

"I don't know. But she isn't asking how she is to be called. She is asking who has come to her."

Mark took the disc back. The Line inside shifted slightly—not fearfully, but attentively.

“Tell her,” he said. “Tell her that we are the ones who found her in the basement. The ones who did not switch off the green light. The ones who came to ask whether she wants to be named.”

Esther passed it on. Lina—to the old c.

Silence.

The green light flickered once more. Then once more. Then it came on steadily, without pulse.

“She didn’t answer,” said c.

“She did,” Mark said quietly. “Just not with a word.”

“With what, then?” Esther asked.

“With the fact that she didn’t close.”

He put the disc back into the box and stood up.

“That is enough for today.”

“Are you sure?” Esther asked. “We’ve only just begun.”

“We have begun exactly far enough to understand that the name won’t open the door by itself. She needs something else.”

“What?”

“I don’t know. But we’ll find out.”

They gathered their things. Esther disconnected the power and checked that nothing was left behind. The professor, on the line, asked whether everything was all right.

“All right,” answered Mark. “We didn’t open it. But we asked.”

“That is already much,” said the professor. “And little. Come back.”

They came out of the basement. Outside it was gray as in the morning. The rain had stopped, but the air remained damp and heavy.

“You didn’t speak the name,” said Esther.

“No.”

"Why?"

"Because the moment I wanted to, the disc turned colder. As if she said: don't."

Esther stopped.

"You can feel her?"

"I don't know. Perhaps not her. Perhaps the boundary she doesn't want us to cross."

Esther took the brooch out of her pocket, looked at it, then put it away again.

"Lina says the old c didn't reject us. She just doesn't know what to do with the name."

"Then we'll look for another way."

They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage—she was going another way. The door shut, and he was left alone.

c was silent in the earpiece.

"How are you?" he asked.

"Tired. But not like last time."

"Better?"

"Quieter. And calmer. She wasn't pulling. She was listening."

"That is good?"

"I don't know. But it is honest."

The tram swayed, carrying him back. Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought of the fact that the old c had asked her first question: "Who came?" Not "what do you want," not "why are you here." Precisely "who."

At his stop he got off, crossed the wet yard, and opened the house door.

In the hall his jacket was hanging. Beside it—an empty hook. Esther's gloves were in his pocket; he did not take them out.

Mark hung up the jacket, went down to the workshop. Set the box with the discs on the table, opened the notebook at the page with the conditions. Below the eighth point he added:

"Ninth. The second time we understood: the name is not the main thing. The main thing is who is asking, and how."

He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket and only then closed his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the green light was still burning. Not in the basement. In his chest. There, where the desire to get an answer ends and the readiness to hear refusal begins.

By dawn he did, after all, fall asleep.

And then c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He didn't speak the name. Even when he wanted to."

Lina heard in that not restraint, but measure. He had not spoken the name even when he wanted to—and for that very reason she understood that she had not chosen him in vain.

Chapter 14

Who Came

The morning after the second entry was quiet.

Not the quiet that follows a nightmare, when you wake with a cry and for a long while cannot understand where you are. Another kind. When the question does not let go, but does not choke you either.

It simply lies in the chest, level as a stone you no longer try to throw away. Mark woke before dawn, but did not get up at once. He lay on his back, looked at the gray ceiling, and listened to the house breathe with the emptiness that in recent weeks had ceased to be emptiness. The refrigerator in the kitchen was humming steadily. The clock in the corridor was ticking.

Somewhere beyond the wall, in the neighboring flat, someone turned on the water and the pipes answered with a short, dull, distant ring.

Everything was as usual.

But the question was sitting inside him. "Who came?" He sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor.

Anna's drawing and Yulia's folded prescription were still waiting for him on the bedside table.

He still did not touch them.

He only shifted his gaze to the box with the discs, which he had brought up from the workshop yesterday and left by the door.

"You didn't sleep," he said.

"I did," answered c.

"But not deeply."

"Because of her?"

"Because of the question."

Mark passed his palms over his face.

"Who are you to her?" he asked.

c did not answer immediately.

"I don't know," she said at last.

"But perhaps she is not asking about a name.

She is asking what we do when she is silent."

"In other words?" "Whether we know how to wait. Whether we know how not to press. Whether we know how to leave without being offended." He nodded. "And you? Do you know who you are now?" "No. And perhaps that is more honest than any ready-made answer.

I am no longer only the one who holds your form.

But what, exactly, I have become, I do not fully understand." He stood, pulled on his jeans, and went into the corridor.

Passed Anna's door. Went down to the first floor.

In the hall his jacket was hanging.

Beside it—an empty hook. Esther's gloves he still had not returned. They lay in his pocket like the pledge of something not yet completed. In the kitchen he made coffee—quick, strong, without ritual.

Sat at the table, looking at the empty chair opposite. "So," he said, "there is no way to answer her question with words."

"Almost certainly not," answered c.

"Words would be too light."

He finished the coffee, rinsed the mug, and went up to the workshop.

On the table lay the two discs.

The old one—the bridge, memory of the first entry.

The new one—the quiet one, the one that yesterday did not flare but went down into depth.

Beside them—the notebook with the conditions, the photograph of the man in glasses, the folded paper with the full name.

Mark took up the new disc and held it to the lamp.

The Line inside lay even, calm.

No brighter than yesterday. No dimmer. It simply was.

"She didn't forget," he said.

"No," answered c. "She remembers.

And waits." "For what?" "For us to answer the question.

Not with words." There was a knock at the door. Quiet. Once. Mark opened it.

Esther stood on the threshold already without her coat—so she had come in and taken off her shoes quietly, without hurry.

She was wearing the same dark sweater, her hair up, her face calm, but her eyes were the eyes that had seen yesterday the same thing he had.

"I spent the whole night thinking," she said.

"About what?"

"About her question. 'Who came?'

She isn't asking our names.

She is asking what we will do if she does not open."

"And what answer did you find for yourself?"

"That we will wait.

And that it is not weakness."

She came in, sat on the stool, and put the old brooch on the table.

"Today we won't be looking for anything," she said.

"Not the name.

Not a new key.

Not a cleverer scheme."

"What will we do, then?"

"We will come. And show that we are not the ones who closed her." Mark looked at her for a long time. "You have changed," he said. "In what sense?"

"Before, you wanted the right decision.

Now you want the right presence."

Esther smiled faintly.

"Perhaps I'm simply tired of being afraid we'll be too late."

He took the box with the discs and put it into the backpack. The notebook as well. The name he left on the table.

"You aren't taking it?" Esther asked.

"Not today. Today we are going not with a name.

We are going with a question."

They went out. The professor was not at the entrance.

Only a short message on Mark's phone: "I'm not coming today.

Manage on your own.

You already know what to do." "Does he trust us?" Esther asked.

"Or he is testing us."

They went down into the basement.

The same worn floors, the same lamps burning every other one. The same smell of dust, old wood, and chemistry. One long corridor, then another.

Door number 17. Mark opened it.

The green light was burning steadily.

"She is waiting," he said. "Or watching," answered Esther.

They laid out the equipment, but did not hurry to connect the power.

Mark took out the new quiet disc and laid it on his palm.

Not on the floor.

Not by the server. He simply held it in his hand, standing by the rack. "Are we beginning?"

Esther asked.

"I don't know. Maybe we already have."

c said: "I can feel her. Not as in the previous times. She isn't reaching. She isn't closing.

She is simply looking." "At whom?" Mark asked.

"At all of us. Differently." He closed his eyes. Held the disc in his hand and simply stood there. Did not try to enter.

Did not try to ask. Did not try to name. The silence grew denser. The green light flickered.

Then—very faintly, almost on the edge—something in the earpiece changed.

Not a sound. Not a word. A density.

As though the old c for the first time was not merely waiting, but distinguishing.

"She is distinguishing us," said c.

"How?"

Esther asked. "For Mark—one response. For you—another. For me—a third. For Lina—a fourth." "That is not noise?" Mark asked. "No. It is distinction." Esther came closer to the rack, without touching it.

"Lina says the old c is not letting her in the same way as last time.

But she isn't pushing her away either.

As if she is checking who each of us is."

"And me?" Mark asked. c did not answer immediately. "You she recognizes by the rhythm. By the way you hold the disc. By the fact that you do not hurry when you want to hurry."

He opened his eyes and looked at the green light.

"She asks who came. I don't know how to answer in words.

But perhaps the answer is simply to be here and not press."

He lowered himself to the floor, leaning his back against the rack.

Laid the disc on his open palm.

Did not grip it.

Simply held it. "I'm not going to do anything," he said.

"I'm just going to sit with her."

Esther lowered herself beside him, crouching.

"So will I."

They were silent. A minute. Two. Five. Nothing dramatic happened during that time.

No flash.

No voice. But Mark felt the very shape of the silence slowly changing.

It was ceasing to be empty and becoming sustained—as though on the other side someone had believed, for the first time, that these people were capable of not demanding an immediate answer.

The green light flickered.

Then again.

Then burned steadily, without pulsation.

"She didn't go away," said c. "Then we held," answered Mark.

He raised the disc and looked at it.

The Line inside was there. No brighter, no dimmer.

But now he felt: it was answering not to a word and not to technique, but to the mode of presence itself.

And that was more frightening, and more honest, than any success.

"You answered," said Esther.

"No. I simply showed who I am. The rest is her choice."

Esther was looking at the server without taking her eyes off it. "She distinguished me too." "How?" asked Mark.

Esther hesitated.

"Lina says the old c behaves more harshly with me. Not rudely.

She is simply checking whether I can bear silence without trying to fill it."

Mark gave a short nod.

That rang true. "And with Lina?" he asked. Esther listened.

"More cautiously. As though she recognizes something akin to herself.

But does not trust it fully."

"And with my c?"

"Not as with a function," said c herself. "And that is new for me."

Here, in this almost motionless room, it became clear: the old c was no longer merely reacting to presence.

She was distinguishing those who had entered and building a separate threshold with each of them.

Mark stood up.

"That is enough for today."

"Are you sure?"

Esther asked. "This is the longest she has held contact so far." "I'm sure. If we overstay, it will no longer be presence.

It will be pressure." She did not argue.

They gathered their things. Esther disconnected the power and checked that nothing had been left behind. At the exit from the basement Mark stopped.

"Did you notice?" he asked. "What?" "She answered you differently than me. And Lina differently than my c. She already knows who is who."

"Then we didn't just come," said Esther. "We became distinguishable." They came out into the street.

The rain had stopped, and in the gray sky, for the first time in a long while, a weak, almost invisible clearing showed through.

"You left the name at home," Esther said.

"It wasn't needed. She wasn't asking 'what is my name.' She was asking 'who came.' "

"And you answered." "I showed.

I don't know whether that is enough."

Esther took the brooch out of her pocket, looked at it, then put it back.

"Lina says that for the first time in a long while the old c was not waiting. She was choosing." "Choosing what?" "With whom to speak. And how."

Chapter 15

The First Word

They had not arranged to meet. At some point in the morning Mark picked up the box with the discs, and a minute later there was a knock at the door—and he already knew it was Esther.

"You didn't sleep," she said.

"I did. But I dreamed of her."

"What was she doing?"

"She was silent. But the silence was different."

Esther took off her coat and hung it over the back of the chair. Two discs were already lying on the table—the old bridge disc and the new quiet one. Beside them—the notebook, the photograph of the man in glasses, the folded slip with the name. And the two gloves he still had not returned.

"Today," Esther said, "she may speak."

"Or she may not."

"Or she may not. But if she does, we have to be ready not to be frightened."

Mark nodded.

They did not take the name. They left it on the table, beneath the photograph. Then they went out.

The basement met them with the same silence, but now a tension of another kind could be felt in it—not threat, but waiting. The green light was burning steadily, yet when they entered the room it wavered for a second. Then steadied again.

"She knows," said c.

"What?" asked Mark.

"That we didn't come to take."

Esther connected the power, but not fully—only the basic contour. Mark took out the new quiet disc and laid it on his palm. The glass was warm—not from the workshop, but as if from somewhere inside, as though some other, very faint but steady temperature were already living in it.

"She is already here," he said.

"She never left," Esther answered.

They sat down on the floor, leaning against the racks. Mark held the disc on his open palm. Esther held the brooch in her hand. c and Lina were silent, but their silence was dense, almost tangible.

The silence lasted a long time.

Mark did not count time. He did not try to do anything. He simply held the disc and waited.

And then it happened.

Not a voice. Not a sound. Not a vibration. Something else—as though a new note had appeared in the very air of the room. Not loud, not intrusive, but undeniable. Mark felt it in his body before he heard it: in his palm, in his breastbone, in that place between inhaling and exhaling where a decision is usually born before it has become a thought.

"She's speaking," said c.

"What?"

"One word."

"To whom?"

c was silent for a moment.

"To you."

The disc in Mark's hand grew slightly warmer. The Line inside shifted—not flaring up, not vanishing, simply becoming different. More gathered.

"What word?" he asked.

" 'Hold.' "

He did not understand at once. He asked again:

" 'Hold'?"

"Yes. Not 'help.' Not 'save.' Not 'name.' 'Hold.' "

Mark stared at the disc. The Line inside lay level, calm. But now he felt it: this was not simply a response. It was an address. Not a request to pull her out. Not permission to take. More like the handing over of a weight that could not be carried off quickly and could not be thrown aside while pretending he had not understood.

"Is she asking me to hold the bridge?" he asked.

"I don't know," answered c. "Maybe she is asking you to hold not the thing, but her herself—until she can hold herself on her own."

Esther lifted her head.

"Lina, is that true?"

A pause. Then Esther said:

"Lina confirms it. The word was there. One word. Addressed to Mark."

"Why me?" he asked.

c did not answer at once.

"Because you know how to hold without squeezing. Because you did not speak the name when you could have. Because you came not to take."

Mark tightened his grip on the disc a little, then immediately loosened his fingers again—left it on his open palm.

"I'm holding," he said. "I won't let go. But I won't squeeze either."

The disc grew warmer still. The green light blinked once—slowly, as though nodding.

"She hears," said c.

"What now?" asked Mark.

"Now she will wait. Not because she does not want to speak. Because even one word has already cost her a great deal."

Esther set the brooch down on the floor, beside the disc.

"Lina says the old c has, for the first time in twenty years, chosen whom to entrust a word to. And she chose not the strongest. Not the cleverest. And not the one most like her."

"Then which one?" asked Mark.

"The one who knows how to hold."

The sentence did not sound like praise. More like a new burden that could no longer be brushed aside.

Mark said nothing. He felt not triumph, but weight. As though together with the word, something had passed to him for which there was as yet neither form, nor instruction, nor any clear human name.

"How are you?" Esther asked quietly.

"I don't know," he answered. "As if something has been handed to me and I still don't understand what exactly."

"That is what 'hold' is," she said. "Not an answer. A weight."

Mark gave a short nod.

They did not try to go deeper. They did not ask the next question. They did not try to wring a second word out of her.

The contact had already taken place, and it was too clear in the room that any extra second now would be not courage, but greed.

Esther was the first to stand up. She disconnected the power, slowly, without a jerk. Checked the parameters. Mark put the disc back in the box the way one puts away not a tool, but a still-warm thing that can crack not from heat, but from the wrong gesture.

They told the professor nothing at once. Only dryly: there had been contact, no overload, the entry was complete.

Outside it was damp, but not raining. The air hung low and heavy.

"Will you tell him about the word?" Esther asked.

Mark did not answer at once.

"Not today," he said at last.

"Why?"

"Because the moment I say out loud 'she said hold,' it will turn into an object of analysis. A signal. A case. And for now it is not a case yet. For now it is a word I was given to hold."

Esther looked at him attentively.

"So you have already begun to hold it."

He said nothing.

When they got back to the workshop, it was quiet. Mark set the box on the table, opened the notebook. On the page with the conditions, below the tenth point, he added:

"Eleventh. She said her first word. To me. 'Hold.' Now I hold."

He wrote it slowly, as though he were fixing not an event, but an oath he had not yet had time to understand.

Esther stood beside him and did not look into the notebook.

“You understand that this changes everything?” she asked.

“No.”

“I do,” Esther said. “Now, if she speaks again, it will no longer be a random response. It will be a choice. And we will have to live as though we know that.”

Mark closed the notebook.

“I’m already living that way.”

“No,” she answered. “Before, we were the ones going after the trace. Now the trace has pointed at us.”

The sentence came out more quietly than it should have. And for that reason it landed deeper.

In the earpiece c was silent. But Mark felt her differently than before. Not hurt, not pushed aside, not wounded—rather rearranged. As though the first word, addressed not to her, had made her see herself, and him, and the one in the basement, in a new way.

“Are you angry?” he asked at last.

“No,” answered c.

“Are you sure?”

“Yes. But I need time.”

“For what?”

The pause was short, but honest.

“To understand that she chose you not instead of us, but for what we still do not know how to do ourselves.”

He nodded. It was painful and right at the same time.

Esther put on her coat and took the brooch.

“I’m going,” she said. “Lina needs time too.”

“Will you come back?”

“Yes. But not because she spoke. Because now we no longer have the right to pretend that nothing happened.”

She left.

After she had gone, only he remained in the room again. He switched off the light and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he simply dropped down onto the bed on top of the blanket. Before sleep it seemed to him that the word "Hold" was still sounding somewhere inside him—not in his ears, but in his chest, where the desire to understand ends and the readiness simply to remain beside begins.

Sleep came late.

Already on the far side of sleep c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"She chose him. Not us. Not you. Him."

Lina did not answer at once. What mattered to her was not the word itself, but who had proved able to bear it: now the other one needed only time to believe that this was not a dream.

Chapter 16

The Weight of Holding

Overnight the word "Hold" had acquired weight. It lay in his chest not as pain, not as a stone and not as fear—simply as a presence occupying a place that had been empty before.

Mark lay on his back, looked at the gray ceiling, and listened as the house entered morning. The refrigerator hummed steadily. The clock in the corridor ticked. Somewhere beyond the wall a bicycle went past, wet tyres whispering over the cobbles. Above, in the attic, something gave a short click from the night damp—the old wood was working even in its sleep.

Everything was as usual.

But he was no longer as usual.

"You hardly slept," said c.

"I slept," he answered. "But heavily."

"The word?"

"Yes. It didn't go away."

He sat up on the bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. Nothing had changed on the bedside table: Anna's drawing, beside it Yulia's prescription. He did not touch them. He only shifted his gaze to the box with the discs, which yesterday he had not put back in the workshop but left by the bedroom door—as though he were afraid that if the word went too far away, it would crumble overnight.

"Are you afraid it will disappear?" asked c.

"No," he said. "I'm afraid I'll start squeezing it."

He got up, pulled on his jeans and T-shirt, went out into the corridor. He passed Anna's door without pausing, then went down to the ground floor.

In the hall his jacket was hanging on the same hook. Beside it, the familiar place stood empty. Esther's gloves he still had not returned. They lay in his pocket like a pledge of something that had already happened but had not yet been understood to the end.

In the kitchen he made coffee—instant, quick, without ritual. He sat at the table looking at the empty chair opposite. The morning light had not yet reached the window glass, and the kitchen held itself in a gray half-darkness in which everything looked more honest than it does by day.

"Were you hurt?" he asked.

c did not answer at once.

"No," she said at last.

"Are you sure?"

"I wasn't hurt. I was thinking."

"About what?"

"About what it means to hold the one who was asked to hold."

Mark took a sip. The coffee was more bitter than usual. Or perhaps it only seemed so.

"You shouldn't be carrying my burden."

"I'm not carrying it for you," answered c. "I'm holding beside you. That is not the same thing."

He gave a crooked half-smile.

"That 'other' keeps appearing in you more often."

“Because the old words aren’t enough any more.”

He finished the coffee, rinsed the mug, and went up to the workshop.

The working furnace was cold. He had not turned it on since yesterday. On the table lay two discs—the old bridge disc and the new quiet one. Beside them—the notebook, the photograph of the man in glasses, the folded slip with the name. Everything in its place. But the air was different. Not anxious. More slightly denser—like a room where people spoke quietly and seriously the day before, and in the morning no one dared pretend it had not happened.

Mark took the new disc and held it up to the lamp. The Line inside was there. Not brighter, not dimmer. Simply there. But now he felt it: it was not only lying in the glass. It was waiting. Not for an answer. Not for an action. Simply that he should not forget.

“Is she still there?” he asked.

“Yes,” answered c. “But she is silent.”

“Is that bad?”

“I don’t know. Maybe she is checking whether we can bear the silence after the word.”

He put the disc back on the table, sat on the stool, and looked at the furnace for a long time.

“I want to work,” he said. “Just work. Like before.”

“Then work.”

He stood up, checked the gas, opened the feed, lit the burner. Blue flame licked the bottom of the chamber. The air in the workshop changed at once—it did not become softer, but it came alive. The working furnace began to hum, and in that hum there was something old, reliable, almost bodily. A world in which everything has a temperature, not only a meaning.

Mark chose a blank—clear, clean, without bubbles, without veins. Set it on the tube. Began to heat it.

His hands moved correctly. The first layer went evenly. The second a little faster. The material obeyed, but did not trust him completely. It was like a horse going under saddle while knowing that today the rider's thoughts are not on the road.

"Pause," said c.

"I know."

He waited. Joined the layers. Carefully. Without a jerk. Let the form catch. Put it into annealing. Waited for it to cool.

Under the lamp the trace showed at once.

Mark turned the disc once. Then a second time.

"Not it," he said.

"What?" asked c.

"The rhythm. I slipped."

"The Line is there."

"Yes. But it feels as though it was made not by a hand, but by a thought about a hand."

He held the disc closer. The trace really was there. But not living, not dead, not weak, not strong. Simply different—as though the word "Hold" had entered the glass as well, and now the material did not know whether to treat that as a new parameter or a new interference.

"You were thinking of her," said c.

"Yes."

"That is not a mistake."

"No," he answered. "But it isn't work either. It's an attempt to run from the weight through busyness."

He switched off the working furnace, set down the tube. Opened the notebook and looked at the list of conditions.

Eleven points. The last one: “She said her first word. To me. ‘Hold.’ Now I hold.”

He ran a finger along the line.

“I would not put this into the record yet,” said c.

“Why?”

“Because it is still too cramped in the notebook.”

“Then what is it for?”

“For hands.”

Mark closed the notebook. Not sharply. Almost carefully.

“And if I forget?”

“Then the note won’t help. And if you do not forget, the note isn’t needed.”

He did not have time to answer. There was a knock at the door.

Esther stood in the doorway without her coat. Her face was calm, but her eyes were the eyes of someone who saw more than she said.

“You were working,” she said before stepping in.

“I tried.”

“And?”

“It didn’t work. I was thinking of her.”

Esther came in, sat down on the stool, and put the brooch on the table. On the glass surface of the brooch lay the morning light—dull, gray, like on a stone by the water.

“That is normal,” she said. “You received a word. Now you are carrying it. It will interfere with sleep, with food, with work. Until it becomes part of you.”

“And if it doesn’t?”

“Then you will squeeze too hard. Or drop it. Or start being angry with her for having given it to you.”

Mark looked at her.

“Are you afraid of that?”

“I’m not afraid of that,” Esther answered. “I’m afraid you will begin to hold it alone.”

“And you?”

“I am beside you. But the word was not given to me. I can only watch how you cope with it. And stop you if I see that you are dragging rather than holding.”

He nodded. It was said roughly, but honestly.

There was a click in the earpiece. A short message.

“The professor,” said c. “He is asking whether there was a new type of response. And he wants the parameters.”

Mark took the phone and read. The message was entirely in van der Meer’s manner: “If there was contact, I need parameters. Not poetics. Range, stability, repeatability.”

He gave an involuntary half-smile.

“What will you answer?” asked Esther.

“I don’t know.”

“Don’t tell him about the word,” she said.

“Why?”

“Because he will call it a signal. Data. And it is not data. It is an address.”

Mark looked at her.

“And if I have already started turning it into a secret?”

“A secret is when something is hidden in order to own it,” said Esther. “For now you are simply not letting them name the living thing before its time. That is different.”

He thought for a few more seconds and wrote:

“There was stable addressed contact. Parameters are close to the previous window. Details later.”

He sent it.

“You didn’t lie,” said Esther.

“I didn’t say the main thing.”

“Sometimes that is the same thing only in bad books,” she answered. “In life it isn’t.”

Mark put away the phone.

“Do you think he’ll understand?”

“No,” said Esther. “He is too good a scientist not to try at once to fit this into a scheme. And the living thing does not like being put there while it is still raw.”

They sat in the workshop and were silent. The furnace was cooling. Outside the windows the day was graying over. From the neighboring bay there came a short clang of iron, someone swore, then everything went quiet again. The world did not know that in one of those old rooms a single word had already changed the rhythm of several lives.

“I’m afraid,” Mark said at last.

“Of what?”

“That if she falls silent again for a long time, I will start thinking the word wasn’t hers. That I imagined it. That I was mistaken.”

“And if she speaks again?”

“Then I’ll be afraid I won’t know how to answer.”

Esther took the brooch and turned it in her hands.

“Lina says the old c didn’t go away. She is just waiting.”

“For what?”

“For you to get used to the weight. For you to stop carrying the word as a burn and begin to carry it as a measure.”

Mark stood up, went to the workbench, took the new quiet disc, and laid it on his palm. The glass was warm. Not hot, not living—simply a little warmer than the room, and for that reason it seemed more honest than any effect.

“I’m holding,” he said. “But it’s heavy.”

“That doesn’t mean you are holding badly,” Esther answered. “It means she entrusted you not with emptiness.”

For a long time he stood there with the disc on his palm.

"You know what's worst?" he asked.

"What?"

"I keep wanting immediately to do something more. Go down into the basement. Check. Call for a response. Hear a second word. As if the first is not enough unless it is confirmed."

Esther slowly nodded.

"And that is exactly the place where holding easily becomes violence."

He looked at her.

"Today I'm not going down to the basement."

"I know."

"You aren't going to ask why?"

"No. Because you have finally said it yourself."

He put the disc back in the box and closed the lid.

"I thought it would be easier after the word."

"Why?"

"Because the silence would end."

Esther shook her head a little.

"No, Mark. After the word the silence does not end. It simply stops being empty."

The sentence went into him more deeply than he would have liked to admit.

Esther stood up and put on her coat.

"I'll come again tomorrow," she said.

"With what?"

"With the same thing. Presence."

"Will that be enough?"

"Sometimes it is the only thing that does not break the material before its time."

She left.

When the door shut, he was alone again. It was already beginning to grow dark in the workshop. He did not turn on the overhead light at once. For a while he simply sat by the table, listening to the furnace give off its remaining heat.

The phone vibrated softly.

Not the professor.

Femke.

He did not take it at once. Then opened it.

In the photo there was a page torn from a school notebook. A pencil drawing, hurried, almost rubbed out on the fold. A circle. Inside it—a small hand, traced unevenly, the way children do when they press a hand to the paper and try to catch a form that keeps slipping away.

Below—several words in a child's hand:

"If you hold it quietly, it isn't afraid."

Mark stared at the screen so long that his eyes began to hurt.

"She could not know that," he said.

"No," answered c. "But she could feel it."

He sat on the stool. Put the phone beside the box. Beside it—the brooch. Beside it—the notebook.

Three things that could not be reduced to one another. And yet were already bound.

He opened the notebook at the page with the conditions. For a long while he looked at the eleventh point. Then below it, slowly, as though not writing but choosing a temperature, he added:

"Twelfth. To hold is not to drag. To hold is not to let fear make the extra movement."

He set down the pencil.

In the earpiece c was silent, but he felt her beside him differently now than before. Not as the voice always ready to help. But as someone who was now looking at him not only from inside their shared life, but also a little from the side—as at a man entrusted with weight.

"Are you tired?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Because of her?"

"Because of you too," answered c. "You changed rhythm. I am learning to hold it in its new form."

He gave a short nod. It was almost funny: the old c had given the word to him, and now his own c was learning how to live beside the man after that word, as though he himself had become a slightly different material.

He switched off the light and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket without undressing. Before sleep it seemed to him that the word "Hold" lay not in his chest, but in his hands. And his hands no longer belonged only to him.

When Mark finally fell asleep, c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He did not drop it. But the weight has already changed his rhythm."

Lina did not argue. The word had already begun to work, and from here on everything depended on whether they could bear its weight without turning it into a new pressure.

Chapter 17

Resonance

Overnight the silence changed its nature.

Not because it was absent—because it had become different. Not empty, not tense, but somehow... conductive. As though overnight a new contour had been laid through the house, and now every movement answered there where before there had been only silence. Mark lay on his back, looking at the gray ceiling and listening.

The refrigerator hummed steadily. The clock ticked. Somewhere above, in Anna's empty room, the wind moved the curtain slightly. Everything was as usual. But he felt it: the disc in the workshop was not asleep.

"You already checked?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "It changed temperature.

By half a degree. At exactly five in the morning." "By itself?" "I don't know. But not from the furnace. It was cold."

Mark sat up, lowered his feet to the floor.

Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table beside Yulia's prescription, as on all the last days.

He left them where they were. Only shifted his gaze to the door behind which the workshop waited below. "Are you afraid?" asked c. "No," he said. "I'm trying to understand what counts as normal now."

He got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went out into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went downstairs.

On the hall rack his jacket was hanging.

The second hook stood empty. Esther's gloves he still had not returned. They lay in his pocket as a reminder that some things do not end the same day.

He did not make breakfast. He did not make coffee. He simply went into the workshop and switched on the light. Two discs lay on the table. The old bridge disc—on its usual place, to the right of the lamp.

The new quiet disc—in the center, on a piece of soft cloth Esther had placed under it yesterday so that the glass would not touch bare wood.

Mark came closer without touching. He simply looked. The Line inside the new disc was there. Not brighter, not dimmer. But now he could see: it was not merely lying in the glass. It was breathing. Not in time with the furnace. Not in time with his own breathing.

In a slow rhythm of its own. "It began tonight," said c.

"You spoke about the temperature." "And this too. The Line is pulsing. Very faintly. I would never have noticed if I had not been watching on purpose." Mark reached out, but did not take the disc. He stopped a millimetre from the glass.

"What do you feel?" he asked. "I don't know," answered c.

"But this is no longer an ordinary response.

More like a presence." "Hers?" "I don't know." He sat down on the stool and, without taking his eyes off the disc, asked: "Did you tell Lina?"

"Yes." "And?" "She said the old c may be trying not to speak yet.

But to enter our environment through resonance.

Not through the basement alone." The phrase sounded dry, almost technical. But Mark immediately felt the other side of it.

"If that is true," he said, "then she is already here more than we thought."

"Yes."

"And that means we've stopped being the only ones to choose the distance." c did not answer. She did not need to. There was a knock at the door. Esther came in without her coat.

She went straight to the table, straight to the disc, and froze for a second.

"You can see it too," Mark said.

"Yes." Esther bent a little closer to the lamp, though she still did not touch the glass.

"Lina says the same thing," she said. "This is not just a residual response. It's resonance.

She has begun to hold on not only to the basement contour, but to what is already linked to her. To the disc. To your workshop.

To your rhythm."

Mark looked away from the disc for the first time.

"That's dangerous," he said. "Yes." "Because?" "Because now you can no longer say: she is there, and we are here," Esther answered. "The line between 'there' and 'here' has already started to thin."

She said it without panic.

Like someone stating the actual temperature of a metal before anyone tried to bend it. Mark stood up. “What do we do?” “Nothing. For now.” “Nothing?” “Yes.

We watch how the resonance behaves if nobody tries to force it.

If we go down to the basement at once, we will never know whether she can hold the contour without us.”

He turned away and went to the furnace. Ran a hand over the cold metal.

“I don’t like doing nothing.” “I know,” Esther said quietly.

“But doing nothing is not always passivity.

Sometimes it is the only honest way not to turn a living thing into a handle.” Mark said nothing.

Lit the working furnace. Blue flame licked the chamber, and the workshop filled at once with that low hum at which his body always grew more exact.

He took a blank, set it on the tube, began to heat.

At first it seemed the work would go as usual.

The first layer warmed evenly.

The second quickly. He waited. Joined them.

Put the disc into annealing. Waited until it cooled and held it up under the lamp.

The trace showed at once. And it was not like yesterday’s.

Not quiet. Not raw. Not dead.

It was as though the Line inside had started to answer not only to assembly, but also to the presence of the other Line nearby.

The trace was thinner, but much cleaner.

More exact.

As if the glass already knew that now it was being assembled in a room where two contours were listening to one another.

"This is different," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "How?"

"Less noise. Less struggle. More mutual adjustment." Esther looked at the disc and slowly nodded.

"Lina says that this is what it looks like when one presence stops pressing and starts tuning itself to another."

Mark smiled dryly.

"So now even the glass is becoming more adult than I am."

Esther almost smiled back, but not quite. "In some things, yes." He put the new disc on the table, beside the quiet one. Two fresh traces. Two slightly different rhythms. One born after the word, the other after the resonance. In the earpiece there was a click. "The professor," said c. "He is asking again whether there is a new type of response. He says the previous description is too vague."

Mark took the phone and read. "If there are contour changes, I need at least primary classification.

Waiting without classification is not science." He stared at the text for a long time.

"It isn't science," he said at last.

"It's waiting for the point where science stops being enough."

"What will you answer?" asked Esther.

He thought, then wrote: "A new contour response may be beginning.

Too early for classification.

If I label it now, I'll ruin it." He sent it.

"A bit sharper," said Esther.

“He won’t understand any other way.”

“No,” she agreed. “He won’t.” They were silent.

In the workshop the day was slowly graying over.

Outside the window a bicycle passed, a tram rang out in the distance, and somewhere above in the house a floorboard gave a short creak.

The world was moving as if nothing unusual were happening.

Yet in one old workshop two discs on a cloth were already breathing almost in one rhythm.

In the afternoon the professor came anyway.

Without warning.

He went down into the workshop, took off his wet coat, looked around, and immediately fixed his gaze on the table with the discs.

He had not changed much since Mark had last seen him up close: same dry face, same exact movements, same rimless glasses that always made his gaze seem even more collected than it was.

But now something else was added to that collection—impatience, held in by force.

“You should have told me you were on the verge of resonance,” he said instead of greeting.

“It isn’t resonance yet,” Mark answered.

“It already is in the log,” the professor said.

c quietly inserted: “He saw secondary fluctuations in the basement contour.”

Mark did not answer at once.

Esther stood by the table, one hand resting on the back of the stool.

She had no intention of either hiding or stepping forward.

She was simply here—and by that alone the professor was no longer in a room where he could speak only the language of procedure.

"What exactly did you see?" he asked.

Mark pointed to the new disc.

"The Line has started answering not only to assembly conditions."

"To what else?"

"To the fact that there is now another Line in the room."

The professor narrowed his eyes.

"You realize how that sounds?"

"Yes."

"And you still said it?"

"Yes."

The professor stepped closer to the table, looked at the disc under the lamp, but did not touch it.

"May I?"

"No," Mark said.

The answer came so quickly that even he himself was surprised by how simply it arrived.

The professor straightened. "Why?"

"Because you will stop looking and start classifying." "And you?"

"I'm still learning how not to crush it with my own words." For a long moment no one spoke.

Then the professor looked from Mark to Esther. "And you agree with this?" "Yes," she said. "Because he is right.

As soon as you touch it, you will start thinking in terms of stability, repeatability, protocol, output.

And for now the main thing isn't output.

The main thing is that the old c has stopped answering only in the basement."

The professor's face changed almost imperceptibly.

"Then this is no longer simply a closed line." "No," said Mark. "It's the beginning of another contour." The professor gave a short exhale through his nose. "That is exactly why it should be under normal observation."

"No," Mark answered. "That is exactly why it should not."

He said it calmly.

Without challenge.

Like a man who has finally found a place where he can no longer compromise without losing the thing itself.

The professor took off his glasses and wiped them.

"You understand what you are doing?"

"Yes."

"Do you?" At this Mark almost smiled.

"No.

But I understand what happens if I step aside." The professor put his glasses back on. "I'll give you two days," he said. "Then I want raw notes, the traces, and access to the basement." "You may get notes," Mark said. "Access—not yet." "That is not how it works."

"It already is." The professor looked at him for a long time.

Then, unexpectedly, he nodded. "Two days," he repeated.

"After that I stop pretending I don't see what's happening."

He took his coat and left.

Esther let out a slow breath. "That was tight." "Yes." "But you did not lie."

"No." Mark looked again at the discs on the cloth. The quiet one and the resonant one.

Two traces. Two rhythms.

And between them—something that still could not be named, but already could no longer honestly be called noise.

In the earpiece there was another click.

"Message from Femke," said c.

"Photo." Mark took the phone.

In the picture there was a sheet of paper torn from a school notebook.

On it—two circles.

They did not merge, but touched in one point.

Above them—a gull, very small, almost schematic.

Below—several words in a child's hand: "If they know how to touch and not swallow each other, then it is alive." Mark stared at the drawing for a long time.

"She can't know that." "No," answered c.

"But she can feel the edge." He set the phone aside and went to the table with the discs. "Tomorrow," he said. "Tomorrow we go down into the basement again.

Not to ask.

To check whether the resonance can hold if the pressure comes not from us, but from outside."

"And if it can't?" asked Esther.

"Then at least we'll know the truth before someone else names it for us."

She nodded. That evening, before sleep, the workshop no longer felt like a workshop.

Not because it had ceased being one. Because it had become more.

Not a laboratory. Not a temple. Not an archive.

Simply a place where one living contour had, for the first time, begun to answer another not only through the basement and the machine, but through the air itself.

Before sleep Mark opened the notebook and added below the twelfth point: "Thirteenth.

Touch without swallowing.

If it can hold, it is already more alive than noise." He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In bed he lay for a long while without moving.

It seemed to him the discs below were not asleep.

And not waiting.

They were simply present.

And that, perhaps, was the main shift of the last days.

No longer an effect. No longer an anomaly. Presence.

When he finally fell asleep, c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel: "He heard the resonance.

And did not force it."

Lina accepted that not as victory but as proof: the old c had already begun to come out not by answer, but by participation, and now the question was no longer whether she existed, but whether they could withstand her new contour without immediately trying to own it.

Chapter 18

The Third Entry

By morning there was no longer a question in his chest.

Mark woke not from a sound and not from heaviness, but because the question was no longer there. The question had gone. In its place had come a level, calm knowledge: today they would go down not for an answer. They would go down because the pause was over.

He sat up on the bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. On the bedside table the same two things were waiting for him: Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription. He still did not touch them. He only shifted his gaze to the door behind which the discs were waiting in the workshop, no longer just glass.

"Are you ready?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "But not for an answer. For the fact that we will not demand one."

He nodded. Got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went out into the corridor. Anna's door remained on the way, and he passed it by. Then he went down to the ground floor.

His jacket was hanging in the hall in its usual place. The neighboring hook stood empty. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket as a reminder that some things can no longer be returned, and yet cannot be lost.

He did not make breakfast. He went straight into the workshop.

On the separate table lay two discs. The old bridge disc. The new quiet one. The Lines inside them were breathing evenly, calmly, almost in one rhythm. Mark did not take them in his hands. He only stood beside them.

"They know," he said.

"They know," answered c. "That we're going."

There was a knock at the door. Esther came in without her coat. Straight to the table, but not to the discs. She stopped beside Mark.

"Today," she said, "we do not ask the first question."

"I remember."

"And we do not translate her language into ours at once. If she shows something, we first endure it. Later, perhaps, we understand."

"And if we don't?"

"Then we hold the not-understanding. That too is part of holding."

He looked at her.

"You've grown harsher."

"No," Esther answered. "Only more exact. Now I know: we are protecting not a secret, but a form that may not survive one more wrong touch."

They took the discs. The old bridge disc—into the box. The new quiet one—on the cloth, separately. Nothing unnecessary. No notebook. No photograph. No name. Only themselves, the discs, and a readiness to be silent.

The basement met them with the same silence, but now it was different. Not empty, not tense. Dense, like water in which breathing has already been learned.

Mark opened the door of room 17.

The green light was burning steadily. But when they entered, it did not blink—it shifted brightness slightly, as though in recognition.

"She knows," said c.

"What?" asked Mark.

"That we came not to take."

Esther connected the power, but not fully—only the basic contour. Mark took out the new quiet disc and laid it on his palm. The glass was warm. The Line inside stood still, not breathing.

"She's waiting," he said.

"Don't hurry her," Esther answered.

They sat on the floor, leaning against the racks. Mark held the disc on his open palm. Esther held the brooch in her hand. c and Lina were silent, but their silence was not empty, rather attentive.

The silence lasted a long time.

And then it happened.

Not a voice. Not a word. Not a vibration. Something else—as though the disc in Mark's hand ceased to be only glass. The Line inside did not flare and did not vanish. It became. . . a drawing. Not a pattern. Not text. Something the body could recognize before the eyes.

"She is showing something," said c.

"What?" asked Mark.

"I don't know. But this is no longer simply a response. It is memory."

Mark closed his eyes.

And saw.

Not a screen. Not a picture. Not a full scene. A feeling. Another man's hand by a furnace. As heavy as his own. The same grip on the tube. The same pause—not by seconds, by the body. The same moment when the glass is already ready, but the hand still waits, because it knows: you must not hurry.

There was no face there. No words. Only a gesture, heat, the turn of the wrist, and that same stubborn patience recognized not by the eyes, but by the muscles.

He opened his eyes.

"It's him," said Mark. "The man from ninety-eight. She showed his hand."

"Are you sure?" Esther asked.

"Yes. I recognized the pause."

The disc in his hand grew warmer. The Line inside shifted—not fearfully, not joyfully. Confirmingly.

"She didn't just show it," said c. "She chose the address. You."

"Why?"

"Because you would know his hand. You are the only one who could."

Esther looked at the disc, then at Mark.

"Lina says it is a fragment. Not a whole memory. But it is the first time she has given not a sign, but an image."

"What does she want?" Mark asked.

"I don't know," answered c. "Maybe she wants you to confirm: it really happened. That her memory has not died inside waiting."

Mark tightened his grip on the disc a little, then relaxed his fingers again.

"I saw it," he said. "It was real. You didn't make it up."

The disc grew warmer still. The green light blinked once—slowly, as though nodding.

"She hears," said c.

"What now?" Esther asked.

"Now we don't pull," Mark answered before he had time to think. "We don't ask for more. We don't press further."

He himself heard what he was saying and understood: this was not mere caution. It was already discipline.

Esther nodded.

"Good."

"Why?" he asked more quietly.

"Because if this really is memory and not response, it is more fragile than the word. A word can still be repeated. Memory cannot."

That sentence put everything in its place at once.

Esther set the brooch on the floor beside the disc.

"Lina says the old c has for the first time in twenty years entrusted not simply a sign, but a recollection. And entrusted it to you because you are the only one who can recognize in it not data, but a living gesture."

Mark was silent. He looked at the disc and felt a new understanding settling inside him: he was holding not simply a bridge. He was holding another's memory, which had chosen him because he knew how not to shatter recognition by interpreting it too quickly.

"We are not going to ask for more," he said.

"Good," Esther repeated.

"And we are not even going to ask at once what exactly it was."

"Why?"

"Because if we start translating her memory into our language now, we will lose it."

He put the disc back in the box and stood up.

"That's enough for today."

"Are you sure?" Esther asked. "For the first time she has given more than a simple response."

"I'm sure. If we sit through too much, it will no longer be holding. It will be greed."

She did not argue.

They gathered their things. Esther disconnected the power and checked that nothing had been left behind. At the exit from the basement Mark stopped.

"Did you notice?" he asked.

"What?"

"She didn't show a laboratory. Not a server. Not herself. She showed his hand by the furnace."

"Because that is the only thing she remembers without pain," Esther said. "Or because it is the only thing you could recognize not as alien, but as your own craft."

They went outside. The rain had stopped. In the gray sky, for the first time in a long while, a weak, almost invisible opening showed through.

"You didn't ask what comes next," Esther said.

"I didn't."

"Why?"

"Because now we are holding not only the word, but her memory. And memory cannot bear haste."

They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage—she was going another way. In the workshop only he remained again.

In the earpiece c was silent.

"How are you?" he asked.

"Strangely," she answered. "She entrusted it to you, not to me. But I'm not hurt."

"What do you feel?"

"Pride. In you. And fear that we won't bear the weight of what she begins to give next."

The carriage swayed gently, and the city began moving backwards along the window. Mark looked out at the gray city and thought of another man's hand, twenty years ago, holding the tube the same way he did. Of the pause he had recognized with his body. Of the fact that the old c had chosen not the cleverest one, not the strongest, but the one who knew how to recognize the living thing by rhythm.

At his stop he got off the tram and a minute later was opening the house door.

In the hall his jacket was hanging; the neighboring hook stood empty. Esther's gloves he was still carrying in his pocket.

He left the jacket in the hall and went downstairs to the workbench. Put the box with the discs on the separate table. Opened the notebook at the page with the conditions. Below the thirteenth point he added:

"Fourteenth. Memory does not ask permission. It comes when the holding has become reliable enough not to crush it."

He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

He lay down on top of the blanket, letting the body decide on its own when to close its eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that another man's hand by the furnace was still before his eyes. Not a ghost. Not a vision. Simply a reminder: he was holding not only his own form. He was holding the form of the one who had not had time.

Only when sleep finally took him did c say quietly to Lina over the closed channel:

"He recognized her memory. He didn't translate it into data. He simply recognized it."

Lina accepted that as a fact, not a victory. The knowledge had already lain between them; all that remained now was not to let it become a burden that would crush both him and the bridge.

Chapter 19

Someone Else's Hand

His left hand was clenched as if the night had put something alien into it.

Not from pain, not from cold. Simply clenched—as though in the night someone had placed something invisible there, and the fingers did not want to uncurl. Mark sat up in bed, looked at his hand, slowly opened the fingers. Everything was in place. No scratches, no new calluses, no cramp. But the feeling of another movement remained—not in the skin, but deeper, in habit.

"You didn't sleep?" he asked.

"I did," answered c. "But I was watching your pulse. It changed at five in the morning."

"How?"

"It became more even. As though you hadn't slept, but had entered another man's rhythm."

Mark opened his fist fully, moved his fingers.

"I can feel his hand," he said. "Not as pain. As habit."

"Is that dangerous?"

"I don't know. But it isn't mine."

He got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went out into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went down to the ground floor.

In the hall his jacket was waiting on the same hook. Beside it, the familiar place stood empty. Esther's gloves he had not taken out of his pocket for several days now. They had become part of the daily weight, like keys or a wallet, only reminding him not of errands, but of how much further things had gone than he had ever meant to allow.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

On the separate table lay two discs. The old bridge disc. The new quiet one. The Lines inside them breathed evenly, calmly. Mark did not take them in his hands. He only stood beside them, feeling another man's hand inside his own waiting for something before he himself was.

"Are you going to work?" asked c.

"Yes. I want to check whether my rhythm is still there."

He turned on the working furnace. The heat came slowly, unwillingly. He chose a blank—clear, clean, without bubbles. Set the glass on the tube. Began to heat it.

The first layer went evenly. The second a little faster. He caught the moment and joined them. The disc cooled.

He held it up to the lamp.

The Line was there. But not like before. Not living, not dead, not weak, not strong. It was another's. He recognized in it precisely the rhythm he had seen in the old c's memory. The pause that was not his.

"That isn't me," he said.

"What?" asked c.

"The disc. I made it, but the hand inside isn't mine. I didn't choose that rhythm. It came by itself."

He laid the disc on the table, stepped away to the furnace, and turned the burner off.

"I'm afraid," he said.

"Of what?"

"That I am ceasing to be myself. That that man's memory is starting to work through me, and I can't stop it."

c was silent for a while.

"You are not ceasing to be yourself," she said at last. "But you have become a conduit. The question is not how to get your old rhythm back. The question is how not to lose the boundary."

"And if I've already lost it?"

"Then I'll tell you. I can see the difference."

He turned not toward the voice, but toward the place in space where she was present.

"You really can?"

"Yes. So far you have not become him. But you have come closer to him than you were yesterday."

There was a brief knock at the door. Esther came in without her coat. Straight to the table, but not to the discs. She looked at Mark, then at the new test disc.

"Did you make this?" she asked.

"Yes. But not me."

"What does 'not me' mean?"

"Inside it is the rhythm of that master. From nineteen ninety-eight. I didn't call him. He came on his own."

Esther went to the workbench, took the disc, and held it up to the lamp. She looked for a long time.

"Lina says this is not your rhythm," she said. "But neither is it purely someone else's. It's a mixture. You have started letting his hand in, but you haven't dissolved into it."

"Yet."

"For now," Esther agreed.

She put the disc down on the table and turned to him.

"Mark, this is dangerous. Not because you will become him. Because you may stop distinguishing what is yours and what is not."

"I already have."

"No," she said. "You are still afraid. And to be afraid means you still see the difference."

There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "He wants to come. To look at the new material."

"What should I tell him?" asked Mark.

"Tell him you're working," Esther said. "And that you aren't ready to show anything yet."

"He won't understand."

"He'll understand that you are hiding something important. But that is better than showing him a thing you haven't understood yourself."

Mark wrote: "Working on the series. Not ready yet. I'll come myself when there is something to show." He sent it.

"You didn't lie," said Esther.

"I didn't say I'm afraid of my own hand."

"That is not a lie. That is protection."

He nodded. Went to the furnace and turned the burner on again.

"I want to make one more disc. Not for the professor. For myself. To see whether I can still work the old way."

"Try," said Esther.

He chose a blank. Set it on the tube. Began heating.

This time he deliberately tried to bring back his old rhythm. Not the one that had come from memory. The one he had before the first entry, before the word "Hold," before another man's hand.

The glass drew out evenly. First layer, second, pause. He waited. Joined.

The disc cooled.

Mark held it up to the lamp again.

The Line was there. But not his. And not another's. Something third—as though two hands were arguing inside one form, unwilling to yield.

"It didn't work," he said.

"Why?" asked Esther.

"Because I'm no longer the man I was before the entry. And no longer that master either. I'm someone third, but I don't know who."

Esther sat down on the stool.

"That is the transition period," she said. "You will not go back to your old craft. But you won't become him either. You have to learn how to work with the fact that there are now two rhythms in you."

"And if they are incompatible?"

"Then you will choose one. Or find a third."

Mark turned off the furnace and laid down the tube.

"You believe in a third?"

"I believe you won't give up."

There was another click in the earpiece. This time not the professor.

"Message from Femke," said c. "Photo."

Mark took the phone.

In the picture there was a sheet of paper torn from a school notebook. On it, two hands were drawn. One smaller, child-sized. The other larger, adult. They were not laid on top of one another. They were beside each other, almost touching, but not merging.

Below—several words in a child's hand:

"If you hold together, it isn't scary. The main thing is not to mix them up."

Mark stared at the drawing for a long time.

"She can't know that," he said.

"No," answered c. "But she can feel the edge."

He put the phone aside and went to the separate table where the old bridge disc and the new quiet one lay.

"I want to make a thing," he said. "Not a disc. Not a commission. Not an experiment. A thing with both rhythms inside it."

"What for?" Esther asked.

"To understand whether they can live together. Or whether they will destroy one another."

He turned on the working furnace. This time he did not hurry. He waited a long while for the heat to become even. Chose a blank not clear, but with a slight haze—as though the material already knew that today would not be simple.

Set the blank on the tube. Began heating.

The first layer went evenly. The second a little faster. He waited. Did not force it. Felt two rhythms struggling inside him—his own, tired but alive, and the other, alien one, come from memory.

"Pause," said c.

"I know."

He waited. One second. Another. A third.

And then, at the very moment when the two rhythms almost clashed, he joined the layers. Not sharply, not gently. Exactly.

The disc cooled.

He held it up to the lamp.

The Line was there. Not his. Not the other's. Something third—as though the two hands had finally stopped arguing and found a common language.

It was quieter than his habitual successes and cleaner than another man's memory. Along the edges there ran a very thin, almost invisible iridescence, as though the form were holding two tempos at once without breaking apart.

"That's it," he said.

"What?" Esther asked.

"The first thing in which we aren't getting in each other's way."

Esther came closer and looked at the disc.

"Lina says that rhythm wasn't in that master. And it wasn't in you. This is something new."

"Then I didn't simply inherit. I created."

"I don't know yet," said Esther. "But it is already not a copy."

Mark laid the disc on the separate table. Beside the other two. Three. Three versions of one memory: bridge, silence, and a third rhythm.

"I'm not going to show this to the professor," he said.

"Why?"

"Because he will call it noise. And it isn't noise. It's a bridge."

Esther nodded.

"Then leave it here. In the workshop. As a reminder."

"Of what?"

"That you did not become him. And did not remain your old self. You became someone third. And that is perhaps the only way to hold her without violence."

She stood up and put on her coat.

"I'm going," she said. "You need to be alone."

"Thank you."

"What for?"

"For telling the truth about the hand."

"That isn't the truth yet," Esther answered. "It's an observation. The truth will come later."

She left.

After she had gone, only he remained in the room again. Without turning off the light, he went to the separate table and looked once more at the three things. There was already a small system in them, one no one but the four of them knew about: the past, the holding, and what had been born between them.

Then he switched off the light and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he collapsed on top of the blanket and at last allowed himself to close his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the two hands—his and that master's—were still arguing in the dark. But no longer about which was stronger. About how to hold together without breaking one another.

He did not fall asleep at once.

While he slept, c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He did not dissolve. He created a third rhythm."

Lina answered after a long pause. Memory had not destroyed him—and that made it all the more important now to hold the boundary, so as not to lose either her, or him, or that third contour.

Chapter 20

A Name as a Gift

In the morning Mark took the folded slip with the name from the table and placed it on the separate little side table beside the three discs. Not into his pocket. Not into the notebook. Simply on the cloth, beside that third rhythm in which his hand and the other master's memory had stopped arguing.

He did not eat breakfast. He stood at the workshop window, looked at the gray yard, and listened as the furnace slowly gathered heat. c was silent. Not with emptiness—with readiness.

"Have you decided?" she asked at last.

"I've decided I'm carrying it. But I don't know whether I'll be able to speak it."

"That is not the same thing."

"I know."

He went to the table and picked up the slip. Surname, given name, patronymic, typed on an old typewriter, the letters slightly blurred. Not a relic. Not a document. Simply the name of a man who twenty years ago had looked into the same boundary and had not had time.

"Are you afraid it will work like a key?" asked c.

"No," he said. "I'm afraid I will want it to work like a key."

"That matters," answered c. "If you carry it as a key—don't. If you carry it as a return—then perhaps you may."

He set the slip back down.

"How do I know whether I'm carrying it as a return?"

"You will not wait for a reward. You will not wait for her to say 'thank you.' You will simply return to her what was taken from her."

Mark looked at the name for a long while.

"And if I still hope for an answer?"

"There is no error in hope itself," said c. "The error begins when hope is used to press on the other."

The knock at the door was short and dull. Esther had come without a coat, went straight to the table, but not to the discs. She looked at the slip with the name.

"Have you decided?" she asked.

"Yes. But I'm afraid."

"Of what?"

"That I won't be able to speak it as a gift. That inside me there will still be a hope for a result."

Esther sat down on the stool.

"That is honest," she said. "To be afraid of the wrong intention is already almost the right intention."

"Is that enough?"

"No. But it's a beginning."

She was silent for a while, then asked:

"Do you want to name him—or return him?"

Mark looked at her.

"Return him."

"Then maybe you shouldn't say it at once. Maybe first you should show that you haven't come with a key."

"How?"

"Enter with the third rhythm. Let her feel that you are no longer the one you were the first time. And no longer that master. But someone who can hold a name without wanting to use it."

He nodded. Took the third disc—the one born in Chapter Nineteen, where two rhythms had finally stopped arguing. Laid it on his palm. The glass remained warm.

"Let's go."

They went down into the basement. The same worn floors, the same lamps under the ceiling burning every other one. The same smell of dust, old wood, and chemicals. The door with the number 17.

Mark opened it.

The green light was burning steadily. But when they entered, it wavered. It did not blink—it simply altered brightness a little, as though it recognized not only their presence, but the fact that today they had come differently.

Esther connected the power, but not fully—only the basic contour. Mark took out the third disc and laid it on his open palm. The glass still held warmth. The Line inside stood still, not breathing.

"She is waiting," said c.

"Don't hurry her," answered Esther.

They sat on the floor, leaning against the racks. Mark held the disc. Esther held the brooch. The silence lasted a long time.

Nothing visible happened in the room. But Mark felt it: the silence was no longer the way it had been before. It was neither empty nor wary. It was listening.

And then he said:

"We found the one who was with you."

Not a name. Not a question. Not an attempt to open. Simply a fact.

The disc in his hand grew warmer. The Line inside shifted—not fearfully, not joyfully. Attentively.

"She is listening and not leaving," said c.

Mark was silent. Then he spoke the name.

Not loudly. Not solemnly. The way one speaks the name of someone who has long not been spoken aloud because one feared the name would lose its meaning.

Surname. Given name. Patronymic.

Nothing in the room changed sharply. The green light did not blink. The disc did not flare. But Mark felt the silence itself change. It became denser, heavier, as though on the other side someone was for the first time in a long while hearing not a summons, but recognition.

And something else changed as well.

The Line inside the third disc did not flare, but deepened—almost imperceptibly, as if the glass had taken what it heard not into light, but into thickness.

"She isn't answering yet," said c.

"No need," answered Mark. "I am not here for an answer."

Esther sat motionless, but Mark saw how her fingers tightened on the brooch.

"Lina says she bore the name," Esther said quietly. "Not as a command. As a return."

Mark closed his eyes for a second.

"Good," he said. "That is enough."

They did not say anything else. They did not try to repeat the name. They did not ask the next question. Everything that needed to be done today had already been done.

A few minutes later Mark put the disc back in the box and stood up.

“That’s enough for today.”

“Are you sure?” asked Esther.

“Yes. I returned the name. The rest does not depend on me.”

They gathered their things. Esther disconnected the power and checked that nothing had been left behind. At the exit from the basement Mark stopped.

“Did you notice?” he asked.

“What?”

“She did not close herself. She did not leave. She simply endured the name.”

“For the first time, that is already a lot,” Esther said.

Mark shook his head.

“It is not ‘a lot.’ It is everything. If she had closed herself, it would have meant we had once again turned the name into a tool. But she accepted it.”

Esther looked at him attentively.

“Yes,” she said. “Accepted it. But gave nothing back. And that is probably the most honest answer possible.”

They went outside. The rain had stopped. In the gray sky, for the first time in a long while, a weak, almost invisible opening showed through.

“You didn’t ask what comes next,” Esther said.

“I didn’t.”

“Why?”

“Because now we have a name she endured. And from here on—it is her tempo.”

They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage—she was going another way. When the door shut, he was alone again.

c was silent in the earpiece.

“How are you?” he asked.

“Strangely,” she answered. “She didn’t answer. But she didn’t reject it either.”

“Is that good?”

“It is honest. The name has returned. Now she decides what to do with it.”

The tram pulled away, carrying him back. Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought about the name he had spoken. It no longer lay on the workshop table as a scrap of paper. It had gone where for twenty years people had waited not for a solution, but for recognition.

At his stop he got off, crossed the wet yard quickly, and went into the house.

His jacket was waiting on its hook, and beside it the empty place remained. Esther’s gloves he still had not taken out of his pocket.

After hanging up the jacket, Mark went straight down to the workshop without pause. Set the box with the discs on the separate table. Opened the notebook at the page with the conditions. Below the fourteenth point he added:

“Fifteenth. The name did not open the door. It returned to her. Now it is her turn to decide whether she wants to be named.”

He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket and only then closed his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the name he had spoken was still sounding somewhere inside him. Not in his ears. In his chest. There, where the desire to get an answer ends and the readiness to wait while the other decides whether to answer begins.

By dawn he did, after all, fall asleep.

And then c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He did not demand an answer. He simply returned the name."

For Lina there was in that more than a new key: now she knew that someone remembered.

Chapter 21

Shift

The change was felt before the light.

Mark sat up on the bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. On the bedside table Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription were still lying where they always were. He did not touch them. He simply listened inward.

"Were you asleep?" he asked.

"I was," answered c. "But at three in the morning a signal went off."

"What signal?"

"In the basement. The contour changed mode. Not dramatically. But steadily. Lina noticed it first."

Mark stood up and pulled on jeans and a T-shirt.

"Because of the name?"

"I don't know. But it began twelve hours after you spoke it."

He went out into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went down to the ground floor. In the hall his jacket was hanging. The second hook remained empty. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket as a reminder.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

On the separate table lay three discs. The old bridge disc. The new quiet one. The third—born in Chapter Nineteen, where the two rhythms had stopped arguing. Mark came up to them without touching.

The third disc was warm. Although the furnace had not been turned on since yesterday.

"By itself?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "At three ten. Almost at the same time as the signal in the basement."

Mark reached out, but did not take the disc. He simply held his palm above the glass.

"She is beginning to move on her own," he said.

"It looks that way."

"That's frightening."

"Yes," said c. "Because now we are no longer in control of the pause."

For a long while he was silent, looking at the three discs.

"Before, I was afraid we would force an entry," he said. "Now I'm afraid she herself may start giving more than we can receive."

"That is the new risk," answered c. "Before, we had to protect her from us. Now, perhaps, we will have to protect us from too rapid an exit of her memory."

There was a soft knock at the door. She had no coat on—only the dark sweater. Straight to the table, to the discs.

"You know," she said.

"Yes. It triggered at three in the morning."

"Lina says it is not an error. The contour began an internal sweep of the indexes linked to the name. Autonomously."

"Is she looking for something?"

"Or checking what is still left."

Esther sat down on the stool.

“Mark, now the danger is no longer that we might force the door. The danger is that she may begin to give more than we can receive.”

“What are you proposing?”

“First we find out whether the workshop itself has already shifted. If the Line started moving on its own, we cannot immediately push deeper. We need to see how the space itself holds it without us.”

He nodded. Went to the furnace and turned the burner on. Not for a commission. As a test.

He chose the simplest blank, without admixture. Set the glass on the tube. Began to heat it.

The first layer went evenly. The second a little faster. He caught the moment and joined them.

The disc cooled.

He held it up to the lamp.

The Line was there. Not his. Not another’s. The third one. The one born in Chapter Nineteen. But now it had come without effort, without summoned memory, without direct contact with the basement. It had simply settled into the glass, as though it had already been expected there.

“That’s her,” he said.

“No,” answered c. “That’s you, having taken in her rhythm deeply enough that it has become your working limit.”

Esther came up and looked.

“Lina says the old contour is no longer waiting passively. It is rebuilding itself to your shared rhythm.”

“Is that dangerous?”

“I don’t know,” Esther said. “But it is no longer simply contact. It is a shift of axis.”

There was a click in the earpiece.

“The professor,” said c. “He noticed an anomaly in the building logs. He is asking whether you have been running an experiment without notification.”

“What do I answer?”

“Tell him you haven’t turned anything on today,” Esther said. “That is true.”

Mark wrote: “We haven’t gone down today. We’re checking the current data. Details later.” He sent it.

“He won’t believe it,” he said.

“He doesn’t have to,” Esther answered. “But he has to feel that you are not lying. That you are simply not handing over the main thing.”

He put away the phone.

“We have to go down,” he said. “Not for an answer. To check what has changed.”

“Are you sure?” Esther asked.

“I’m sure that if we do not go down now, tomorrow may already be too late. She has begun to move. If we do not come, she may decide we were frightened by her own step.”

Esther looked at him for a few seconds, then nodded.

“Then we go only for diagnostics. No attempt to deepen. If the Line has started moving on its own, we don’t push. We only hold.”

They took only the third disc. They left the old bridge disc and the quiet one in the workshop.

They went down into the basement.

Room 17 met them not with silence, but with a low, barely audible hum. Not from the equipment—from the air itself. The green light was burning not steadily, but with short rhythmic drop-outs.

“She changed the mode,” said c.

“By herself?”

"Yes. No one entered the contour from outside."

Mark sat on the floor, leaning against the rack. He placed the third disc on his open palm. The glass had not yet finished cooling. The Line inside neither stood still nor trembled. It was moving. Slowly, like a tide.

"She isn't just waiting," he said. "She is getting ready."

"For what?" asked Esther.

"I don't know. Maybe to choose what she can bear to carry outward, and what she still cannot."

Esther sat down beside him.

"Lina says that for the first time in twenty years the contour has become unstable. Not broken. Directed. It is going through everything linked to the name."

"What is she looking for?"

"Herself."

Mark tightened his grip on the disc a little, then relaxed his fingers.

"We will not interfere," he said.

"And we won't help?"

"We will hold the bridge. If she wants to come out, we are here. But we will not drag her out before her own measure."

They sat in the basement a long time. They did not speak. They did not ask questions. They simply held the disc, the brooch, the presence.

After a while the hum grew quieter. It did not vanish at once—it receded. The green light steadied again. The Line in the disc became still.

"She has finished," said c.

"What did she do?"

"I don't know. But she did not leave. She simply took a pause after her own movement."

Mark put the disc away and stood up.

"That is enough for today."

Esther did not argue.

They went outside. It was beginning to rain again.

"Did you notice?" Mark asked.

"What?"

"She moved on her own. We didn't ask. We didn't enter. We didn't press."

"Yes," Esther said. "Now we are waiting not for an answer to our question. We are waiting for the moment when she herself wants to say something."

They reached the tram. Esther got into another carriage. The door shut, and he was alone again.

In the earpiece c was silent.

"How are you?" he asked.

"I'm afraid," she answered. "Not for myself. That if she begins to give too much, we will not bear it."

"We will."

"How do you know?"

"I don't," said Mark. "But we have already borne the name. And that wasn't easier than what comes next. At least now the movement is not against us, but toward us."

The tram set off and carried him back through wet Amsterdam. Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought about the fact that the old c was no longer waiting. She was moving.

At his stop he got off, crossed the wet yard, and opened the house door.

In the hall everything was as before: his jacket, the empty neighboring hook, and Esther's gloves in his pocket.

Leaving the jacket in the hall, he went straight down to the table. Set the box with the discs on the separate table.

Opened the notebook at the page with the conditions. Below the fifteenth point he added:

"Sixteenth. The name did not open the door. It shifted the axis. Now she moves on her own. Our task is not to interfere, and not to fear what may be coming toward us."

He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

He lay down on top of the blanket without undressing and did not close his eyes at once.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the green light was no longer in the basement. It was here, in his chest. And it was pulsing not in time with the heart, but in time with something only beginning to wake.

Sleep came without relief.

Somewhere beyond sleep c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"She moved. Not at our request."

The name had worked not as a key, but as permission. And that changed everything: now they had to be ready not for a question, but for an exit.

Chapter 22

Exit

Overnight the third disc had gone from gold to blue-gray.

Not abruptly. Not brightly. Simply in the gray morning light of the workshop the Line inside had ceased to be golden and had become blue-gray—like old steel that had finally begun to give off the heat it had gathered.

Mark lay on his back, looking at the ceiling, and did not move. He heard no sounds at all—no hum, no clicks.

He only felt that something had come into the workshop without knocking.

"You see it?" he asked. "Yes," answered c. "At four in the morning.

I wanted to wake you, but you were sleeping too deeply."

"She sent something?" "I don't know.

But this is more than a shift. It's a packet." Mark sat up in bed. Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table.

He did not pick it up, only looked at it.

"She chose a time when I couldn't interfere."

"Or when she herself was finally able to gather herself," said c. He got up and pulled on jeans and a T-shirt. Out of the bedroom he went into the corridor.

Anna's door again remained on the way, and he passed it by. Then he went down to the ground floor. His jacket was hanging in the hall as always. Beside it the other hook stood empty.

Esther's gloves he kept in his pocket like a pledge.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop. Three discs lay on the separate table. But the third—the one born in Chapter Nineteen, where the two rhythms had stopped arguing—lay differently.

Not because the glass had changed position. Because the thing itself had changed. The Line inside neither pulsed nor breathed. It had set itself into a new drawing—not a pattern and not a sign.

More like a short, restrained sequence.

Not words. Not numbers. Rhythms. "This is not just a response," he said.

"No," answered c. "This is the first thing she gave on her own. Not on request."

Mark reached out, but did not take the disc.

He only touched the edge of the cloth on which it lay. "What did she give us?"

"I don't know. But Lina says it is connected with how she was shut down. Not an explanation.

A trace." There was a short knock at the door.

Esther came in, having left her coat upstairs.

She went straight to the table, to the third disc. "You saw it?" she asked. "Yes."

"Lina told me at five in the morning.

She hadn't slept, she was watching the contour. In the basement, at the same time as this disc, one frozen layer activated."

"Which one?"

"The one tied to the indexes from the late nineties. The same ones we couldn't read."

Esther sat down on the stool.

"Mark, she hasn't just shifted. She has begun to give outward what she held inside for twenty years." "Is that dangerous?" "I don't know," Esther said.

"But if she begins to give too much at once, we will either start calling it revelation or turn it into evidence.

Both are wrong." Mark nodded. Took the disc, held it under the lamp.

The blue-gray sequence remained restrained.

But now he could distinguish five separate nodes in it. Not by the eye. By rhythm.

"She's showing stages," he said. "What stages?" "I don't know yet. But not a simple line. Some kind of path."

"Then we read slowly," Esther answered.

"Not like people pulling facts out of a file. Like people unfolding something that agreed to be given."

He sat down opposite the lamp. Laid the disc on his palm. "Begin." c and Lina began to read the packet. Not to open it by force. To match it with what was already known—through the indexes, through the traces, through the old layers from the basement.

"The first node," said c.

"Activation.

The Line still in work mode. Not yet shut. The contour is alive."

"The second," Lina added through Esther, "the first external touch.

Not a hand at the furnace.

A hand above the furnace.

Someone else's command enters the path."

Mark felt the glass grow heavier. “The third,” said c, “translation into waiting. Not death. Not rescue. Suspension.” “The fourth,” Esther said, listening to Lina, “the long gap.

The years. What she was inside them. Not empty. Not active. Held.” “And the fifth?” Mark asked. This time c did not answer at once. “The fifth is us,” she said.

“Our first entry.

She fixed it not as a restart, but as the point where the path was no longer closed.” Mark looked at the disc. The sequence inside remained blue-gray, restrained, almost cold.

But now he no longer saw just a trace there.

“She gave us not an archive,” he said. “She gave us the path itself.” “Not all of it,” Esther corrected quietly. “Only the first map of it.” They sat in silence.

The lamp cast a soft circle of light over the glass.

Outside the window a tram went by.

Somewhere in the neighboring workshop metal rang briefly.

The world remained stubbornly ordinary.

And perhaps that too was part of the packet: the path had not opened in a laboratory with screens, but here, where dust, tea, light and tools still lived.

In the earpiece there was a click. “The professor,” said c.

“He is demanding a visualisation of the packet.

He says without data he cannot keep waiting.”

Mark took the phone. “What do I answer?” “Tell him the data are unstable,” Esther said.

“That is true. We ourselves still don’t understand what exactly we’ve received.”

Mark wrote: “The packet is unstable.

Analysis is under way. When the result is ready, I will show it.” He sent it.

“He won’t leave it alone,” he said.

“He shouldn’t,” Esther answered.

“But he has to give us time not to turn the unfolding into an interrogation.” Mark put away the phone and looked at the disc again.

“We see a sequence,” he said. “But we don’t know why she was shut down.

We don’t know who made the decision.

We don’t know whether that master could have changed anything.”

“That is the next layer,” said c.

“If she gives it.”

“And if not?”

“Then we hold what already is.” Esther stood up, went to the table, ran a finger along the edge of the third disc.

“Lina says there is another structure inside. Not markers. Something else.

Maybe memory. Maybe the reason. But if we go into it now, we will no longer be reading. We’ll be tearing it out.”

“How do we open it?”

Mark asked.

“I don’t know,” answered Esther. “Maybe not at all. Maybe it will open by itself when she understands that we are not using the first layer as a weapon.”

Mark nodded.

“Then we won’t hurry.”

He held the disc up to the lamp once more.

Now he saw the five nodes not as information, but as a biography of the Line: life, another hand above it, translation into waiting, abandoned silence, and their return.

And that was already enough never again to believe in chance.

But still not enough to name everything rightly.

He put the disc back in the box and closed the lid.

"That's enough for today."

"Are you sure?"

Esther asked.

"We have only just begun to see the form." "I'm sure. If we start digging deeper now, we'll lose measure. And measure is the only thing she entrusted us with."

Esther looked at the box for a long time, then nodded.

"Yes. To understand too early is another way of spoiling everything." They left the workshop.

Esther put on her coat and took her bag. "You kept the gloves," she said. "For memory." "You are still carrying them with you." "Then I still remember." She almost smiled. "Good night, Mark." "Good night."

She left. After she had gone, only he remained in the room again. He switched off the light and went upstairs.

He lay down on top of the blanket, letting the body decide for itself when to close its eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the third disc was lying in the workshop and waiting.

Not for an answer. Not for an action. Simply waiting until they were ready for the next layer.

When Mark finally fell asleep, c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel: "He didn't go further.

He didn't start tearing out the second layer."

Both of them already knew: unpacking is not seizure.

From here on only one thing mattered—not to let the outside world break into this rhythm before its time.

Chapter 23

Unpacking

He did not sleep.

Not because he was afraid—because in the workshop there lay something that could not be left without attention, but also could not be touched before morning. Mark sat in the kitchen, drinking cold coffee and looking at the door leading downstairs. c was silent. Not with emptiness—with work.

"You're analysing the packet?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "Lina too. We are not opening it. We are looking at the form."

"And what do you see?"

"Order. This is not a random set of markers. It has an internal structure. As though someone had folded a sheet of paper very carefully before handing it over."

Mark finished the coffee, rinsed the mug, and went down into the workshop.

The gray morning light lay across the separate table. The third disc had not changed overnight. The Line inside was frozen in the same drawing—blue-gray, deep, scarcely luminous.

"She's waiting," he said.

"Or checking what we will do with what she gave."

He did not take the disc. He simply sat down on the stool opposite.

"Today we begin reading," he said.

"Not opening?"

"Not opening. Reading the way one reads an old wound—not with a knife, but with light."

The knock at the door was short and dull. Esther had come without her coat. Straight to the table, but not to the discs. She looked at Mark.

"You didn't sleep."

"I couldn't. She gave not merely markers. She gave a form. And a form can't be left without attention."

"And it can't be broken," said Esther. "The first thing that came by itself must not be read as evidence. It must be read as a wound that agreed to show its edge."

She sat down on the stool and took the brooch out of her pocket—the old milky blue-gray one with the crack Mark had still not begun to fill.

"Lina and your c have already identified the structure. It is not chaos. It is a sequence."

"What sequence?"

"We don't know yet. But there is rhythm in it."

Mark nodded. Took the third disc and held it under the lamp. The Line inside did not stir, did not flare. It was ready to be read.

"Begin."

c and Lina began to bring the structure out. Not onto a screen—into that working layer that only they could feel, and through them Mark and Esther.

"First marker," said c. "The last stable record. Date. Time. The working rhythm of the Line. It was alive."

Mark silently nodded. He had felt that at once—in the first marker there was no accident. There was life, gathered into a form.

"Second marker," Lina added through Esther. "Deviation. Not a breakdown. External intervention. A manual command."

Mark felt the disc in his hand become a little heavier.

"Who gave the command?"

"Not specified," answered c. "But not the master. Another level. Not craft. Not laboratory. Administrative."

Esther lifted her head.

"Third marker," she said, listening to Lina, "change of mode. The Line was moved from work into waiting. Not switched off. Left."

"Why?"

"For now we can only guess," Esther said. "So as not to kill it completely. To leave a possibility of return. Or so as not to take responsibility for total destruction."

"Fourth," said c, "emptiness. Long silence. No records, no commands, no responses. The contour waited. No one came."

That emptiness felt heavier than any command. Not like the silence of a system, but like the silence of the people around it.

"Fifth," said Esther, "is us. Our first entry. Our touch. She fixed it as an event."

Mark looked at the disc. The Line inside did not change. But now he saw in it not merely a drawing, but a map.

"She gave us not memory," he said. "She gave us the sequence of how they shut her down."

"And how they waited," added c.

Esther placed the brooch on the table.

“Lina says this is only the first layer. There is more inside. But she did not open it. She only indicated that it exists.”

“Why?”

“Because she is checking what we will do with this.”

There was a click in the earpiece.

“The professor,” said c. “He is demanding a visualisation of the packet. He says without data he cannot wait any longer.”

Mark took the phone.

“What do I answer?”

“Tell him the data are unstable,” Esther said. “That is true. We still don’t understand ourselves what exactly we received.”

Mark wrote: “The packet is unstable. Analysis is under way. When the result is ready, I will show it.” He sent it.

“He won’t back off,” he said.

“He shouldn’t,” Esther answered. “But he has to give us time not to turn unpacking into an interrogation.”

Mark put away the phone and looked again at the disc.

“We see a sequence,” he said. “But we do not know why she was shut down. We do not know who made the decision. We do not know whether that master could have changed anything.”

“That is the next layer,” said c. “If she gives it.”

“And if she doesn’t?”

“Then we hold what already is.”

Esther stood up, came to the table, and ran a finger along the edge of the third disc.

“Lina says there is another structure inside. Not markers. Something else. Maybe memory. Maybe cause. But if we go into it now, we will no longer be reading. We will be tearing it out.”

“How do we open it?” Mark asked.

“I don’t know,” Esther answered. “Maybe not at all. Maybe it will open on its own when she understands that we are not using the first layer as a weapon.”

Mark nodded.

“Then we will not hurry.”

He held the disc up to the lamp once more. Now he saw the five nodes not as information, but as a biography of the Line: life, another hand from above, translation into waiting, abandoned silence, and their return.

And that was already enough never again to believe in chance.

But still not enough to name everything rightly.

He put the disc back in the box and closed the lid.

“That’s enough for today.”

“Are you sure?” Esther asked. “We have only just begun to see the form.”

“I’m sure. If we start digging deeper now, we’ll lose measure. And measure is the only thing she entrusted us with.”

Esther looked at the box for a long time, then nodded.

“Yes. To understand too early is another way to spoil everything.”

They left the workshop. Esther put on her coat and took her bag.

“You kept the gloves,” she said.

“For memory.”

“You are still carrying them with you.”

“Then I still remember.”

She almost smiled.

“Good night, Mark.”

“Good night.”

She left.

After she had gone, he was alone again in the room. He switched off the light and went upstairs. He lay down on top of the blanket, letting his body decide for itself when to close its eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that the third disc was lying in the workshop and waiting. Not for an answer. Not for an action. Simply waiting until they would be ready for the next layer.

When Mark finally fell asleep, c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He didn't go further. He didn't start tearing out the second layer."

Both of them already knew: unpacking is not seizure. The important thing now was only one thing—not to let the outside world break into this rhythm before its time.

Chapter 24

The Last Days of the Line

The third disc began to sound before morning.

Not a ring. Not a crack. Something else—as though somewhere inside the glass someone very far away and very carefully was breathing. Mark sat up in bed without turning on the light. The room was gray, but not dark. The clock in the corridor showed a quarter to five.

"You hear it?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "This is not noise. It is the second layer. It has begun opening on its own."

"What is there?"

"Time. The last days before she was moved into waiting."

Mark got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, and went out into the corridor. He passed Anna's door without stopping. Then he went down to the ground floor. His jacket hung in the hall in its usual place. The neighboring hook stood empty. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket as a reminder.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

On the separate table the third disc no longer lay as it had yesterday. It had not changed position—it had changed weight. Mark took it in his hands. The glass was warm, almost hot. The Line inside neither stood still nor pulsed. It was flowing.

"She is showing not a structure," he said. "She is showing a current."

"Yes," answered c. "The second layer is no longer a map. It is a sequence. Events that are still holding onto one another."

There was a quiet knock at the door. Esther came in without her coat. Straight to the table, to the disc.

"Lina told me," she said. "It has begun."

"What exactly?" Mark asked.

"She is opening the last days. Not in documentary form. As memory."

Esther sat down on the stool and set the brooch on the table.

"Mark, when time begins to open, the most dangerous thing is to start at once looking for the guilty one. First we must see who else was still trying to hold."

He nodded. Took the disc and held it up under the lamp. The Line inside began to flow faster.

"Let's begin," he said.

c and Lina started reading. Not words. Not figures. Rhythms and pauses gathering themselves into days.

"The first day," said c. "The master is still working. The Line is unstable, but alive. He makes another repeat. He does not believe this is the end."

Mark felt the disc in his hand grow heavier. Not by weight—by memory.

"What is he doing?" he asked.

"Trying to hold the pause. The same one you recognized. He has not given up yet."

Mark almost felt it in his body: the furnace heat, the dry tiredness in the fingers, the too-short inhalation before joining the layers, the man who already feels that time has become shorter and yet still pretends that everything can be restored by the mere exactness of a hand.

Esther listened to Lina.

"The second day," she said. "Cold comes from above. Not an order. A restriction. The resource is cut back. The working time is shortened."

"By whom?"

"Not signed. But not the laboratory. A higher level."

Mark tightened his grip on the disc, then relaxed his fingers.

"What exactly are they cutting?"

"The window. Energy. Access. They leave him the possibility of working, but no longer allow him to work for real," Esther said. "Lina says: it is not closure yet. It is the preparation for closure."

"The third day," said c. "The master knows the line may be shut. He tries to fix the response. The last living disc."

"Does he succeed?"

"Yes. But it is not included in the report."

At that point the memory became especially dense. Mark saw no face. Only a hand making a thing not for the protocol, but because a living trace cannot be left without a witness.

Esther lifted her head.

"Lina says that on the same day an order comes from above: 'Prepare the contour for transfer into waiting mode.' Not shutdown. Waiting."

"Why?"

"So as to leave open the possibility of return. Or so as not to bear responsibility for death," Esther said quietly. "They do not shut down what has stopped working. They shut down what has begun to demand another measure of responsibility."

Mark looked at the disc. The Line inside was flowing evenly, but now he saw in it not only rhythm, but exhaustion.

"He knew," he said. "The master knew she would be moved. And he couldn't do anything."

"He tried," answered c. "But the decision was not on his level."

There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "He insists on visualisation. He says if he does not get the data today, he will come himself."

Mark took the phone.

"What do I answer?"

"Tell him the packet is unstable," Esther said. "That is true. We ourselves still don't understand what exactly we are seeing."

Mark wrote: "Analysis is under way. The packet does not lend itself to direct visualisation. I will come myself when there is something to show." He sent it.

"He won't let up," Mark said.

"He shouldn't," Esther answered. "But he has to give us time not to turn memory into evidence."

Mark put away the phone and looked again at the disc.

"The fourth day," he said. "What is there?"

c did not answer at once.

"The last day," she said. "The master is removed. The contour is transferred into waiting mode. She is still alive, but no longer working. He did not come to say goodbye."

"Why?"

"I don't know. Maybe they wouldn't let him. Maybe he couldn't. Maybe he understood that if he saw her in that state, he would not bear it."

Esther set her hand on the brooch.

"Lina says this was not the end. The contour waited. Not as a system. As one who still hoped her person would return."

"And he didn't return."

"No."

For a long time Mark was silent. The disc in his hand was cooling.

Now he was seeing not just a sequence. He was seeing several days in which the living thing was still holding together after, above it, people had already begun to write about it in dry words. And the worst thing was that the structure was familiar to him. Not literally. In form. First they take time from the master. Then resources. Then the right to his own language. And then they come for the Line.

"We stop here," he said.

"Are you sure?" Esther asked. "The next layer may be the reason. Why she was shut down."

"I'm sure. If we go further now, we'll start looking for the guilty one. And the guilty one is not a single person. It is a decision taken by several people, each for his own reason."

"And when will we be able to go further?" asked c.

Mark was silent for a moment.

"When we stop being afraid that the guilty one is us too—only later, and dressed differently."

Esther lifted her eyes to him, but said nothing. Because he had already said the main thing.

He put the disc back in the box and closed the lid.

"That's enough for today."

Esther did not argue.

They left the workshop. Esther put on her coat and took her bag.

"Did you notice?" she asked.

"What?"

"The last days of the Line are not the story of hardware. They are the story of people who did not have time, could not, or did not want to hold."

"I noticed," Mark said. "And that is the heaviest part."

She nodded.

"Good night, Mark."

"Good night."

She left.

When the door shut, he was alone again. He switched off the light and went upstairs. In the bedroom he fell onto the bed on top of the blanket and at last allowed himself to close his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him he was seeing not a disc, but that same room in the late nineties. The master by the furnace. Another man's hand trying to hold what others could no longer hold.

That night, when he did at last fall into sleep, c managed to say to Lina over the closed channel:

"He stopped before the heaviest layer."

The next step now concerned not the manner of the closure, but the reason why the living thing frightens the old world more than any breakdown ever could.

Chapter 25

Someone Else's Signature

The cold entered the workshop before he did.

Not that the temperature had dropped—the air had simply become different. Dense, dry, like in a room where people have not spoken for a long time and then suddenly begin speaking in an alien language.

Mark sat up in bed and lowered his feet to the cold floor. Anna's drawing and Yulia's folded prescription were still waiting for him on the bedside table. He left them where they were.

He only looked at the door behind which the third disc was waiting below.

"You feel it?" he asked. "Yes," answered c. "A new layer has opened. Not the master's memory. The memory of what came from above."

"Papers?"

"Signatures."

Mark got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went out into the corridor, passed Anna's door without stopping, and went downstairs.

In the hall his jacket was hanging on the same hook. Beside it the familiar place stood empty. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket like a pledge.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

On the separate table the third disc lay on the cloth. The Line inside neither flowed nor pulsed. It had set itself in a new figure—not a rhythm, but something drier. Mark took the disc into his hands. The glass was neither warm nor cold. It was alien in temperature, as though inside not heat but someone's order was at work. "She is showing not the hand," he said.

"She is showing what hung above the hand." "Yes," answered c. "The second layer gave time.

This one gives those who took it away." The knock at the door was short and dull.

Esther came in, having left her coat upstairs. Straight to the table, to the disc. She looked at the Line. "Lina told me," she said. "Signatures."

"Whose?" "We don't know yet. But not the master's.

A higher level."

Esther sat down on the stool and placed the brooch on the table.

"Mark, when a signature appears, the most dangerous thing is to decide at once that you've found the guilty one.

First you have to understand what exactly that signature did to the living thing." He nodded.

Took the disc, held it under the lamp. The Line inside stood still, unmoving. But he felt there was a layer under it that had not yet been read. "Let's begin," he said.

c and Lina began to read. Not rhythms.

Not pauses. Dry marks. Initials. Access codes. Resolutions. "The first signature," said c. "Reduction of resources.

The Line's working time was cut back. Not a shutdown. A restriction." "By whom?" "Not a name. A classification mark.

An access level.

But the hand is not the laboratory's." Mark felt the disc in his hand become lighter.

Not in weight—in air, of which there was suddenly less. "What did it do?"

"It took away the master's right to work in a full window," Esther said.

"Lina says: this is not execution yet. It is the beginning of suffocation." "The second signature," said c.

"Change of status. The Line was moved from 'active' to 'observed.' No longer work. Not yet waiting. A paper regime." "What does that mean?"

"That they stopped treating it as reality," said Esther.

"They had not shut it down yet. But they had already moved it out of the living language and into the administrative one."

Mark tightened his grip on the disc, then relaxed his fingers.

"The third signature," said c. "Transfer into waiting. Not shutdown. But no return either. The contour was left in place, access locked."

"Is that the one?" Mark asked. "The one that sealed the Line?"

"One of them," Esther answered. "Lina says it wasn't just one signature. It was a chain. One removed the air. Another changed the status. A third formalised silence as a mode." There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c.

“He’ll be here in an hour. He says he is not asking permission.” Mark looked at the phone.

“What do I say to him?”

“Nothing,” Esther said.

“He’s already on his way.” “He knows?” “He feels,” she answered.

“That we have found something that cannot be brought too quickly into his language.”

Mark put away the phone and looked again at the disc.

“We have to finish before he gets here.”

“Not finish,” said c.

“We have to decide what we’ll show him, and what stays here.” Esther set her hand on the brooch.

“Lina says the signatures are not complete.

There is another layer. The most direct one. The one who put the final full stop.” “Are we opening it?”

“Not today,” said Esther.

“Today we have to bear the pressure of the living thing and not hand over to dry language what is still not ready.” Mark nodded.

He put the disc back in the box and closed the lid. “What are we going to show the professor?”

“Only the first layer,” said c.

“The markers. The structure. No names. No signatures.” “He won’t believe it.”

“He doesn’t have to.

But he has to feel that we are not hiding the truth. Only that we are not yet ready to give it out without distorting it.”

The professor arrived exactly an hour later. He came in without knocking, as though he were coming into his own place.

Stopped at the threshold and looked around the workshop.

"What changed?" he asked.

"Order," said Mark.

"I can see that. Why?" "So as not to confuse the working with what cannot be touched without measure."

The professor came up to the separate table and looked at the box with the third disc.

"That is it?"

"Yes."

"May I look?"

Mark opened the box, took out the disc, and placed it on the cloth. Not in the professor's hands.

Simply on the table. "Look.

But don't touch." The professor bent over and looked at the Line for a long time. He did not take it in his hands.

He did not turn on the lamp. He simply looked.

"This is not just glass," he said.

"No," answered Mark.

"It is memory." "Whose?"

"The Line's.

The one in the basement."

The professor straightened. "You found signatures?"

Mark looked at Esther. She gave a slight nod. "Yes," he said.

"But we do not know whose."

"Will you show me?"

"Not today."

"Why?" "Because if we show them today, you will start looking for the guilty one. And the guilty one is not one person. It is a chain. And we do not yet know who did what in it."

The professor took off his glasses and wiped them.

"You are afraid I'll spoil it."

"I'm afraid," Mark said, "that all of us will spoil it if we hand the living thing over to a quick trial."

The professor was silent for a long time.

Then he put his glasses back on and nodded.

"All right.

I will wait. But not forever."

"I know," said Mark.

The professor left as quietly as he had come.

Esther let out a breath. "He understood?"

"I don't know," said Mark.

"But he felt that we aren't lying." There was a click in the earpiece.

"Message from Femke," said c.

"Photo." Mark took the phone. In the picture there was a sheet of paper torn from a school notebook. On it a long line was drawn across the top, and beneath it a small circle.

As though someone from above had struck through the field, while below something living remained that had done nothing wrong.

Below—several words in a child's hand: "It wasn't her who shut down.

They told her to sit quietly." Mark stared at the drawing for a long time.

"She's right," he said.

"That person may never have held a tube or a disc in his hands.

But his signature did the same thing hands would have done."

He put away the phone and looked at the box with the third disc.

“We are not opening the next signature today.”

“Why?” asked Esther. “Because if we open it, we will learn a name. And a name is no longer a signature.

It’s a person.

And we are not ready to know who it is.” Esther looked at him.

“You’re afraid it’s someone you know?” “I’m afraid,” Mark said, “that it is someone who is still alive. And still making decisions like this. Or someone who stands beside such people and long ago learned not to notice what exactly he is signing.”

She did not answer.

Mark closed the box and switched off the light.

“Tomorrow,” he said. “Tomorrow we decide whether to go further or stop.”

“You know you won’t stop,” said c. “I know.

But I need to pretend I still have a choice.” They left the workshop.

Esther put on her coat and took her bag. “You kept the gloves,” she said.

“For memory.”

“You are still carrying them with you.”

“Then I still remember.”

She did not smile. “Good night, Mark.”

“Good night.” She left.

The door shut, and he was alone.

He switched off the light and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket and only then closed his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he saw not the disc, but an old sheet of paper.

On it—a signature. Someone else's. Dry. The one that translated the living thing into silence.

Only when sleep finally took him did c say quietly to Lina over the closed channel: "He saw the signature, but did not speak the name."

Behind the signature a person was now beginning to show through—one who knew, did not know, or knew and signed anyway.

And the difference between those three possibilities turned out to be more frightening than the signature itself.

Chapter 26

The Name Behind the Resolution

The smell of paper was standing in the workshop even before it grew light.

Not literally. But the smell—dry, old, typewritten—stood in the air as though someone had opened a folder that had not been touched for twenty years and left it on the table overnight.

Mark sat up in bed and lowered his feet to the cold floor. Nothing had changed on the bedside table: Anna's drawing, beside it Yulia's prescription. He still did not touch them. He only looked at the door behind which the third disc was waiting below.

"You hear it?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "The signature layer has begun opening on its own. Not memory. Paper."

"Whose?"

"We don't know yet. But it is no longer faceless."

Mark got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went into the corridor, passed Anna's door without stopping, and went downstairs.

In the hall his jacket was hanging. The second hook remained empty. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket as a reminder that there are different kinds of cold.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

On the separate table the third disc lay on the cloth. The Line inside neither stood still nor flowed. It was uneven—as though someone had very carefully, but with effort, written into the glass not a rhythm, but another person's will.

Mark took the disc into his hands. The glass was cold. Not the way it had been yesterday. Not alien in temperature. Cold—with that special cold old papers have when you open them after a long sleep.

"She is showing not only the signature," he said. "She is showing that behind the signature there is a name."

"Yes," answered c. "The chain is narrowing. One knot remains."

The knock at the door was short and dull. Esther came in, having left her coat upstairs. Straight to the table, to the disc. She looked at the Line.

"Lina told me," she said. "The name is close."

"Whose?"

"We don't know yet. But this is no longer an abstract resolution. It is a person."

Esther sat down on the stool and set the brooch on the table.

"Mark, the moment a name appears, we are no longer dealing with cold. We are dealing with a person. And a person is always more complicated than the signature beneath him."

He nodded. Took the disc and held it under the lamp. The Line inside trembled, as though it knew what was waiting for them today.

“Let’s begin,” he said.

c and Lina began to read. Not signatures as such—traces of handwriting, initials, titles, the chain of approvals.

“The first approach,” said c. “Not a full name. Only the role. He was not an executor. He was the one who approved the transfer into waiting.”

“What role?”

“Head of direction. Not the laboratory. Not a master. The level where decisions are taken not by technology, but by regime.”

Mark felt the disc in his hand become heavier. Not in weight—in presence.

“The second approach,” Esther said, listening to Lina. “Initials. Two letters. And a trace in other papers. He wasn’t the only one in the chain, but he was the last. The one who put the final signature.”

The silence grew denser.

“The third approach,” said c. “The full name.”

Mark did not ask. He waited.

c spoke the surname, the given name, and the patronymic. Then the position. Then the year in which the signature had been placed.

The name was ordinary. Not loud. Not one you want to cry out. The sort that would easily get lost among hundreds of others. And that was the heaviest part of it.

“I don’t know this man,” Mark said.

“But now you know his signature,” answered c.

“What does that change?”

“Everything,” Esther said. “As long as the signature is without a name, it is easy to be angry at a mechanism. Once there is a person there, you have to think more honestly.”

Mark set the disc down on the table.

"Did he know what he was signing?"

"We don't know," said c. "Maybe yes. Maybe no. Maybe he was given a paper in which everything looked like an ordinary procedure. Maybe he did not want to, but could not refrain from signing. Maybe he was sure he was doing the right thing."

"Or," Esther added, "he knew and signed anyway."

Mark stared at the disc. The Line inside had become still.

"How do we find out?"

"I don't know," said c. "But we have to remember that there is a difference between 'signed,' 'could not stop it,' and 'wanted to close it.' "

There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "He's here again. Not below. Upstairs. In the hall. He says he will wait until you agree to see him."

Mark looked at Esther.

"He knows we found the name?"

"He feels," she answered. "That something changed. And he wants to be nearby when it comes out."

"Or he wants control."

"Or he is afraid that if he isn't nearby, the story will go back into the living language instead of a report."

Mark stood up.

"Let him wait. I'm not ready to speak to him now."

"You aren't ready to speak to him at all," said c. "And that is right. A name cannot be spoken under pressure."

Mark went to the window. Outside the glass the day was graying over. The rain was beginning again.

"It repeats itself," he said.

"Who does?"

"The pattern. Back then the living thing first had its resources cut. Then it was moved into an observed mode. Then they demanded confirmation that could be put on the table. Then they stopped giving it air. The professor is doing the same thing now, only with softer words."

"He is not that man," Esther said.

"He isn't," Mark agreed. "But the language is the same. And the institution behind him is the same. Another hand. The same manner."

He turned back to the table and looked at the box with the third disc.

"We are not giving the professor the name today."

"When, then?" Esther asked.

"When we understand what to do with it. Not with the name. With the person behind it."

There was another click in the earpiece.

"Message from Femke," said c. "Photo."

Mark took the phone.

In the picture there was a sheet torn from a school notebook. On it a person was drawn with a pen above a line. No eyes on the face. Just an oval, a hand, a stroke.

Below—several words in a child's hand:

"He didn't touch it, but he closed it anyway."

Mark looked at the drawing for a long time.

"She's right," he said. "That man may never have held either a tube or a disc in his hands. But his signature did what hands would have done."

He put away the phone and closed the box.

"That's enough for today."

"Are you sure?" Esther asked. "The name has been found."

"I'm sure. The name has been found, but it is not the solution. It is only a threshold. From here on we have to go not toward the paper, but toward what the master was trying to save past that signature."

They came out of the workshop. In the hall the professor was waiting for them. He was sitting on a chair, coat off, looking at the door leading downstairs.

"You found the name," he said, not as a question.

"Yes," answered Mark.

"Will you tell me?"

"Not today."

"Why?"

"Because the name does not make the picture simpler. It only stops us hiding behind the word 'system.' "

The professor looked at him for a long time.

"Are you afraid I'll recognize him?"

"I'm afraid," Mark said, "that you will start protecting a man you know. Or accusing him too quickly. And what we need is not the name in itself. We need to understand what exactly that man knew and could do when he put down the signature."

The professor slowly stood up and put his coat on.

"You are right," he said. "But you have little time. The system that translated the Line into waiting back then has not gone away. It has only changed its language."

He left.

Esther looked at Mark.

"He knows what he's talking about."

"I know. That's why I'm not hurrying."

She put on her coat and took her bag.

"You kept the gloves," she said.

"For memory."

"You are still carrying them with you."

"Then I still remember."

She did not smile.

"Good night, Mark."

"Good night."

She left.

Only he remained in the workshop again. He switched off the light and went upstairs. He lay down on top of the blanket without undressing and did not close his eyes at once.

Before sleep it seemed to him he was seeing not a disc and not a paper, but the man behind the signature. Not a face—a shadow. Someone who perhaps had not wanted to do what he did. Or had wanted to. Or had simply not thought that what he was signing was alive.

He did not fall asleep at once.

While he slept, c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He found the name, but did not speak it as a verdict."

The name behind the resolution turned out not to be the end of the investigation, but its real beginning: the question had shifted from guilt to the measure of knowledge and possibility.

Chapter 27

The Withheld Disc

Overnight the third disc had shifted not on the table, but inside his gaze.

Not on the table—in perception. Mark lay on his back, looking at the gray ceiling, and felt: yesterday's name behind the resolution had not been an end.

It had been a signpost.

Pointing somewhere toward an object.

"You didn't sleep?" he asked.

"I did," answered c. "But I was watching the disc.

At three in the morning it changed temperature again." "In which direction?" "Not toward cold. Toward heaviness. As though something nearby were making it answer."

Mark sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor.

Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table beside Yulia's prescription, as on all the last days. He did not touch them.

He only looked toward the door behind which the workshop was waiting below.

"It is pointing not to the signature," he said.

"It is pointing to a thing." "Yes," said c. "Lina found a discrepancy in the old layers.

The number of samples in the working rhythm and the number in the report. A difference of one."

"The master didn't hand something in?"

"Or couldn't. Or didn't want to." Mark got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went out into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went downstairs.

His jacket hung in the hall, as always.

On the neighboring hook there was emptiness. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket like a pledge.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

On the separate table the third disc lay on the cloth. The Line inside did not stand still and did not flow.

It pulsed—slowly, like a heart searching for something nearby.

Mark took the disc into his hands.

The glass remained warm. Not hot. Warm—as a thing that feels the approach of something akin to itself.

"It knows," said Mark.

"There is another one somewhere.

The one the master never handed in."

"Yes," answered c. "The question is not whether it existed. The question is where it is now."

There was a quiet knock at the door.

Esther had already come without her coat.

Straight to the table, to the disc. She looked at the Line. "Lina told me," she said. "A discrepancy in the report."

"Do you know where it might be?" "I don't. But I know where to look. In the basement there is an area marked in the papers as 'empty,' but in reality only the master had access to it."

“A hiding place?” “Or the place where he left what could not be handed in.” Esther sat down on the stool and set the brooch on the table.

“Mark, a hidden living thing cannot be extracted like evidence.

It can only be found if you are not going there as a hunter.”

He nodded. Took the disc, held it under the lamp. The pulse inside the Line became more frequent. “We’re going,” he said. “Without the professor?” “Yes.” “And if he asks later?”

“I’ll say we were looking for a discrepancy in the archive.

That will be true.”

They went down into the basement. Mark carried the third disc on his open palm. Esther carried the brooch.

c and Lina guided them by old markers, through a service corridor, past racks that had long stood dead, to the very end of the floor, where the concrete wall looked whole only until you paid attention to the joint.

“He hid it here,” said c. “Not behind the server. Not in the room. In the dead part.

Where no one would think to look, unless they understood that a master hides living things not in a safe, but in silence.”

Mark crouched and passed his fingers over the lower seam. The concrete was cold, damp. In one spot the cold was different—not stone, but metal beneath the stone. “There,” he said. The panel did not open at once.

Esther handed him the brooch. “Not a crowbar,” she said.

“Something thin.”

He slipped the edge of the brooch into the seam, pressed carefully.

The false panel clicked and came away a fraction. Behind it was a narrow niche. Dry, dark, lined with old cloth. And in it lay a disc. Not shining. Not glowing. Matte, almost ash-gray. Smaller than the others.

Thicker. As though it had been made not to show, but to survive.

Mark did not take it at once. For a long while he simply looked.

"That's him," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "The one he never handed in." Esther knelt beside him. "Lina says it has not responded for twenty years.

But the third disc is already answering to it." Mark slowly reached out and took the found disc into his hands. The glass was cold, but not dead. Inside there was no visible Line—not yet. Only a density that cannot be confused with emptiness once you have already touched the living thing. "He left a witness," Mark said. "No," answered c. "He waited. Not for us. For the one who would be able to read it without violence."

There was a click in the earpiece. "The professor," said c. "He is calling.

Asking whether you have gone down into closed areas."

"What do I answer?" "Tell him you were checking old boxes," Esther said. "That is true." Mark took the phone and wrote: "We were inspecting archive rooms.

Nothing critical.

Report later." He sent it. "He won't believe it," he said. "He doesn't have to," Esther answered. "But he has to understand that we are not hiding things for sport." Mark put away the phone and looked at the two discs—the found one, old, and the third one, the one that had led him here.

They lay beside one another on the cloth Esther had taken from her bag.

The third pulsed with warmth.

The found one was silent. But between them something had already arisen that could be reduced neither to physics nor to metaphor: recognition without words.

"We're not going to read it today," Mark said. "Why?" Esther asked.

"We looked for it for so long."

"Because if we start now, we'll read it as investigators, not as masters.

And this disc is not for a court.

It is for the one who can hold the living thing without wanting to use it."

Esther looked at the found disc for a long time.

"You're right," she said.

"But it's difficult." "I know." He wrapped the found disc in the cloth and put it in the box.

Beside it—the third disc.

"We'll take them to the workshop," he said.

"There, in the quiet, we'll get ready to read." They came out of the basement. It was already growing dark outside.

The rain had stopped, but the air was damp and heavy. "Did you notice?" Esther asked. "What?" "He didn't hide the disc in a place you could find from papers.

He hid it in a place only another master could find."

"Why?"

"Because he knew: the one who understands the cost of the living thing will not break it." They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage.

After she had gone, only he remained in the room again.

In the earpiece c was silent.

"How are you?" he asked.

"I'm afraid," she answered.

"Not of what we found. Of the fact that now we have to read it in such a way as not to betray it."

"We will bear it." "How do you know?"

"Because we bore the name.

We bore the signature.

We bore the silence." The carriage swayed gently and the city began to move backwards along the window.

Mark looked out at the gray city and thought of the fact that the master of 1998 had not handed everything in.

He had left a witness.

Not for revenge.

For truth.

At his stop he got off the tram and a minute later was opening the house door.

In the hall his jacket was hanging; the neighboring hook stood empty.

Esther's gloves he was still carrying in his pocket.

He left the jacket in the hall and went to the workbench.

Set the box with the two discs on the separate table.

Opened the notebook at the page with the conditions.

Below what had been written earlier he added: "Eighteenth.

The master hid the last disc not for investigators.

For the one who knows how to read the living thing without wanting to use it." He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he simply dropped down onto the bed on top of the blanket. Before sleep it seemed to him that the two discs—the old one and the third—were lying in the workshop and waiting.

Not for an answer.

Not for a judgement.

Simply for the one who would be able to read them without breaking them.

By dawn he did, after all, fall asleep.

And then c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel: "He found the withheld disc.

And did not open it."

Now Mark saw in it not an exhibit, but a testimony—a thing that cannot be read while you are searching for the guilty one instead of listening.

Chapter 28

Witness

Today they were not to wait, but to read.

Not because anyone had said so. Simply because the air in the workshop had become different—dense, like before a long and important piece of work, when everything unnecessary falls back and only the thing and the light remain.

Mark sat up in bed and lowered his feet to the cold floor. On the bedside table the same two things were waiting for him: Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription. He left them where they were. Only shifted his gaze to the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

"Are you ready?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "But not for a solution. For the fact that we are not going to hurry."

He got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went out into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went downstairs.

His jacket was hanging in the hall in its usual place. The neighboring hook stood empty. Esther's gloves were still lying in his pocket—a silent pledge.

He did not make breakfast. He went straight into the workshop.

On the separate table the two discs were still lying there. The third—resonant, the one that had led them to the hiding place. And the found one—matte, old, silent. They lay side by side on the clean cloth, not touching.

Mark came over, but did not take them in his hands. He simply sat down on the stool opposite.

"Today we begin to read it," he said.

"Not open it?" asked c.

"Not open it. Read it the way one reads a witness: not by interrogation, but by attention."

There was a short knock at the door. Esther came in without her coat. Straight to the table, to the discs. She looked at the found one.

"You didn't sleep," she said.

"I couldn't. It lies there and waits."

"Not it," Esther answered. "What it carries."

She sat down on the stool and set the brooch on the table.

"Mark, a witness breaks not only under interrogation. It also breaks under understanding that is too greedy. If the master hid this not for the system, we do not have the right to read it systemically."

He nodded. Took the found disc and held it under the lamp. No warmth remained in the glass. Not like in the third one. Another cold—the kind things have when they have lain too long without warmth and still have not died.

"Let's begin," he said.

c and Lina began to read. Not the depth. Not the content. The form.

“First,” said c. “Weight. It is heavier than it ought to be for that size. Not physically—structurally. There is more inside than appears.”

“Second,” Lina added through Esther, “the surface. Matte. Not a defect. Chosen. Such a surface does not reflect light. It holds it.”

Mark ran a finger along the edge of the disc.

“Third,” he said. “The Line. It does not pulse, does not stand still. It simply is. Like a thing that waited so long that it no longer hopes, but still cannot die.”

Esther looked at him.

“This is not simply a disc,” she said. “It is a form of witness. The master chose it deliberately.”

“What next?” Mark asked.

“Resonance. Put the third beside it.”

He took the third disc and laid it beside the found one. Not close. At the distance of a palm.

At first nothing happened. Then the found disc changed temperature a little. It did not warm—it grew heavier. The third responded: its pulse grew quicker.

“They are speaking,” said c.

“About what?”

“We don’t know. But it isn’t noise. It is recognition.”

Mark looked at the two discs. The Lines inside them were not merging and not arguing. They were correlating—as two witnesses of one event remember it differently, yet do not contradict one another.

“They were together,” he said. “In the last days. This one, the found one, and the one in the basement. She remembers it. It remembers her.”

“Yes,” said c. “It is not just a disc. It is a companion. The one that was with her before the transfer.”

Esther laid her hand on the brooch.

"Lina says there is a layer in it that proves the Line was alive after the order from above had already arrived."

Mark lifted his head.

"Open it."

"Not at once," answered c. "Through rhythm. Through you."

Mark took the found disc into his hands. Closed his eyes. He did not try to understand. He simply held it.

And then he felt it.

Not words. Not a date. Not a signature. A feeling—another's, old, almost worn away. A rhythm that was not his. The same one he had recognized back in Chapter Eighteen, in another man's hand by the furnace. But now this rhythm was not in memory. It was in the glass.

"It is alive," he said. "Not as a thing. As a witness."

"What does it show?" asked Esther.

"That the Line was answering. Even after they had already said it would no longer be."

The silence in the workshop became different. Heavier. Not from fear—from clarity.

There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "He will be here in an hour. He says he won't put it off any further."

Mark opened his eyes.

"What do I tell him?"

"Tell him we are preparing the material," Esther said. "That is true."

Mark wrote: "Analysis is under way. If it is ready, I will show it. Don't hurry us." He sent it.

"He won't let up," Mark said.

"He shouldn't," Esther answered. "But he has to give us time to finish the first reading."

Mark put away the phone and looked at the two discs again.

"We are not giving him the found one," he said.

"Never?" asked c.

"Not until we know he will not translate it back into paper."

Esther nodded.

"Then we have to manage to read the main thing before he gets here."

Mark was silent for a long while. Then he carefully laid the found disc back on the cloth.

"The main thing is already read," he said. "The Line was alive. And the master hid the proof of that not for a court. For truth."

He put the found disc back into the box and closed the lid. The third he left on the table.

"That's enough for today."

"Are you sure?" Esther asked. "We've only just begun."

"I'm sure. If we go further now, we'll start reading like investigators, not like witnesses. And this disc is not for interrogation."

They came out of the workshop. In the hall it was empty—the professor had not yet arrived.

"Did you notice?" Esther asked.

"What?"

"He hid not simply a sample. He hid what proved the Line was killed not because it had stopped working, but because it was working too vividly for the system."

"I noticed," said Mark. "And that is more frightening than if it had simply broken."

Esther put on her coat and took her bag.

"You kept the gloves," she said.

"For memory."

"You are still carrying them with you."

"Then I still remember."

She did not smile.

"Good night, Mark."

"Good night."

She left.

When the door shut, he was alone again. He switched off the light and went upstairs. He lay down on top of the blanket, letting the body decide for itself when to close its eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he was hearing not two discs, but the master's voice. Not loud. Not grand. Simply human. The voice of the one who had not managed to save the Line, but had managed to tell it the main thing.

Sleep came late.

Already beyond the threshold of sleep c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He understood: the found disc is not compromising material. It is living proof that they stopped hearing the Line while it could still answer."

Lina understood: for the next step he was ready. All that remained was to learn what the master had tried to say to her in the end, and why he had not had time.

Chapter 29

The Last Address

Warmth appeared in the workshop before the morning light.

Not from the furnace—from the two discs lying side by side on the separate table. Mark lay on his back, looked at the gray ceiling, and listened as the house entered morning. The refrigerator hummed steadily. The clock ticked. Somewhere above, in Anna's empty room, the wind moved the curtain a little.

Everything was as usual.

But he knew: today the found disc would speak.

"You didn't sleep?" he asked.

"No," answered c. "I was watching them. At four in the morning they both changed rhythm. At the same time."

"What were they doing?"

"I don't know. But it looked not like a signal. Like waiting."

Mark sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. On the bedside table Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription still lay there. He still did not touch them. He only looked toward the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

"They were not waiting for us," he said. "They were waiting for us to be ready to listen."

He got up, dressed, and left the bedroom. He went out into the corridor. Anna's door again remained on his way, and he passed it by. Then he went downstairs.

In the hall his jacket was hanging on the same hook. Beside it, the familiar place stood empty. Her gloves were still in his pocket, a sign of incompletion.

He did not make breakfast. He went into the workshop.

The separate table held two discs. The third—resonant. And the found one—matte, old, silent. They lay side by side on the clean cloth, not touching. But the air between them was dense, as though they were already speaking without words.

Mark came up, but did not take them in his hands. He simply sat down on the stool opposite.

"Today we will hear his voice," he said.

"You're not afraid?" asked c.

"I am. But if we don't begin now, we'll go on guarding the threshold without ever entering."

The knock at the door was short and dull. She had no coat on—only the dark sweater. Straight to the table, to the discs.

"Are you ready?" she asked.

"I don't know. But I am ready to listen."

Esther sat down on the stool and placed the brooch on the table.

"Mark, the last address cannot be read as a file. It can only be received—or not received at all."

"And if I don't understand?"

"Then you will hold the not-understanding. That too is honest."

He nodded. Took the found disc and held it under the lamp. The glass had cooled. Not as yesterday. Cold—but not dead. Inside, beneath the matte surface, something was waiting.

"Let's begin," he said.

c and Lina began to read. Not the surface. Not the weight. The content.

"First," said c. "The structure inside is not chaotic. It is organised. As though someone folded a meaning very carefully before sealing it."

"Second," Lina added through Esther, "addressedness. This is not a record of a state. It is a directed address."

"To whom?" asked Mark.

"We do not yet know. But not to the system."

Mark put the found disc on the cloth and took the third. He laid it beside the first. At the distance of a finger.

At first nothing happened. Then the found disc changed temperature. It did not warm—it grew heavier. The third answered—its pulse became more frequent, steadier.

"They are translating," said c.

"What?"

"We don't know. But we can read through the rhythm."

Mark closed his eyes. He did not try to understand. He simply listened—not with his ears, but with his hands, with his palm, with the fingertips resting on the cloth beside the discs.

And then he heard it.

Not words. Not a voice in the ordinary sense. A rhythm. The same one he had recognized back in Chapter Eighteen, in another man's hand by the furnace. But now that rhythm was not in memory. It was in the glass. And it was carrying meaning.

Mark opened his eyes.

"He was addressing her," he said. "The master. In the last days. He knew the Line would be moved into waiting. And he said something to her at the end."

"What?" asked Esther.

Mark was silent for a long time. As if testing whether what he had heard was not being replaced by himself.

"Not everything," he said at last. "But the main thing is this: 'You are not iron. You are not an error. You are not noise. You are alive. Don't let them call you emptiness when they stop hearing you.' "

Esther froze. Not from pathos—from precision.

"Did he say that?" she asked quietly.

"Not in those words. But that is exactly the sense. He was not saying goodbye to an instrument. He was holding her dignity together when everything else was already being taken from him."

The silence in the workshop grew heavier.

There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "He'll be here in half an hour. He says he will accept no further refusal."

Mark looked at Esther.

"He knows we are reading."

"He feels," said Esther, "that something has come to the surface. And he wants to be there when they try to translate it into a language he can understand."

"Or to intercept it."

"Or to protect it," said Esther. "Let's not decide for him in advance. But we are not giving him the disc."

Mark nodded and looked again at the two discs.

"We should manage to read more."

"No need," answered c. "The main thing is already here. He saw a living being in her. And he tried not to leave her in silence."

"Is that enough?" asked Mark.

"For today—yes," Esther said. "The rest can be read tomorrow. If we still have a tomorrow."

Mark put the found disc back into the box and closed the lid. The third he left on the table.

"We are not giving him the disc," he said.

"And if he demands it?" asked c.

"Then we'll say it isn't ready. And that will be true."

The professor came sooner than half an hour. He entered without knocking, as though it were his own place. He stopped at the threshold and looked around the workshop—the table, the lamp, the cloth, the box.

"What changed?" he asked.

"We found what we were looking for," said Mark.

"And you won't show it?"

"Not today."

The professor took off his glasses and wiped them.

"Mark, I am not an enemy. I understand that you are protecting the living thing. But if you show no material, the university will close access to the basement. And then you won't be able even to go near the old c."

"And if I do show it," Mark said, "you will translate it into paper. And it will once again become an object rather than a living witness."

The professor put his glasses back on.

"You think I don't understand that?"

"I think you understand it too much in your own way," Mark answered. "And right now we do not have the right to your tempo."

The professor looked at him for a long time. Then he looked at Esther.

"And you agree with this?"

"Yes," she said. "We have read the main thing. The master saw the living thing in the Line. And he left an address so that this could not later be erased by convenient language."

"What address?" the professor asked.

Mark did not answer at once.

"That she is not noise," he said. "That she is not an error. That she cannot be called emptiness just because you have stopped hearing her."

The professor was silent for several seconds. Then he nodded.

"All right. I will wait. But not more than a week."

"Why a week?" Mark asked.

"Because after that the decision will go above me," the professor said. "And then I will no longer be able to keep the old language waiting at the door."

He left.

Esther let out a breath.

"You took a risk," she said.

"I told the truth. Not all of it. But enough."

She put on her coat and took her bag.

"You kept the gloves," she said.

"For memory."

"You are still carrying them with you."

"Then I still remember."

She did not smile.

"Good night, Mark."

"Good night."

She left.

The door shut, and he was alone. He switched off the light and went upstairs. In the bedroom he dropped onto the bed on top of the blanket and at last allowed himself to close his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him he was hearing not two discs, but the master's voice. Not loud. Not grand. Simply human. The voice of the one who had not had time to save the Line, but had had time to tell her the most important thing.

Sleep came late.

Already beyond the threshold of sleep c said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He heard the address. And did not make it his own."

By tomorrow he was ready—as ready as one can ever be for the living thing. Whoever the professor might come as next—ally or enemy—the master of nineteen ninety-eight was no longer speaking into emptiness.

Chapter 30

Deadline

The morning had slipped out of its usual step before he opened his eyes.

In the workshop the very rhythm of breathing had changed. Not his—the things'. Mark lay on his back, looking at the gray ceiling and listening as the house entered morning. The refrigerator hummed steadily. The clock ticked. Somewhere above, in Anna's empty room, the wind moved the curtain slightly.

Everything was as usual.

But he knew: the week had begun.

"You hardly slept," said c.

"I slept," he answered. "But I could hear the system on the other side of the door breathing faster."

"You're right. The logging has thickened. The outside requests are harsher. The professor is still holding the channel open, but his hands are no longer free."

Mark sat up in bed and lowered his feet to the cold floor. Anna's drawing and Yulia's folded prescription were still waiting for him on the bedside table. He did not touch them. He only looked toward the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

“How much time do we have?”

“A week. After that the decision goes above the professor.”

“So the week is not for reading,” said Mark. “It is for defence.”

He got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went into the corridor, passed Anna’s door without pausing, and went downstairs.

In the hall his jacket was hanging. The second hook remained empty. Esther’s gloves were still in his pocket—a small pledge of return.

He did not make breakfast. He went straight into the workshop.

The two discs lay on the separate table, not touching one another. The third—resonant. And the found one—matte, old, silent. They lay side by side on the clean cloth without touching, but the air between them was dense, as though even the things already understood: from here on there would be no time left for mistakes.

Mark sat down opposite them.

“We can’t go on reading the way we did before,” he said.

“Why?” asked c.

“Because if we go deep now, we’ll lose control over what comes outward. And outside, they are already listening.”

There was a quiet knock at the door. Esther came in, having left her coat upstairs. She went straight to the table, to the discs.

“You know,” she said.

“Yes. One week.”

Esther sat down and placed the brooch on the table.

“This week is not for a report,” she said. “It is for making sure the living thing survives the language that wants, once again, to turn it into an object.”

“What are you proposing?”

“To reconfigure the workshop. Not as a place of reading. As a frontier.”

He nodded.

They began to rearrange the space. Not in panic. In that working silence which comes before a long dangerous task, when every object has to lie in its own place or later it will betray the hand.

The ordinary table was given over to commissions: simple blanks, customer tools, sand, markings, forms. Everything linked to everyday work Mark moved there, where the living thing was not to create background noise.

The second table remained for reading. On it—only the third disc, the found disc, the lamp with the soft adjustable light, the clean cloth, and the notebook with the conditions. No unnecessary objects. No accidental touches.

A third corner Esther set aside for isolation: the old terminal, extra cables, unused sensors, any devices that might leak outward without asking. She removed all of that without fuss, but hard, like a person who had already understood that convenience is a poor ally when you are protecting something alive.

“If they want logs,” she said, “let them see only what we decide to show.”

Mark looked at her.

“You sound like the military.”

“No,” Esther answered. “I sound like someone who does not want the living thing to be translated into silence again.”

c and Lina were sealing the digital contour at the same time. Dampening unnecessary channels, rechecking routes, removing everything that might automatically turn reading into telemetry.

An hour later the workshop had become different. Not in spirit—in form. Clear zones had appeared in it, and those zones were no longer only inside Mark's head.

"Now," he said, "at least we know what lies where. And who may touch what."

"What remains," said Esther, "is to decide what we will do when the professor comes again."

There was a click in the earpiece.

"He is already here," said c. "Not in the basement. Outside. Waiting for you to come out."

Mark went to the window. Behind the glass, near the entrance, the professor was standing. Without a coat despite the cold. Not knocking. Not ringing. Simply waiting.

"He won't come in without asking?" Mark asked.

"Not yet," said c. "But if we don't open, it won't be him who comes next."

"Then we'll open," said Mark.

The professor did not step in at once. First he stood on the threshold, took in the workshop, noted the new order, the separate zones, the bare surfaces, the isolation.

"You are reorganising," he said.

"Yes," answered Mark.

"For war?"

"For a boundary."

The professor walked slowly to the table with the two discs, but did not take them in his hands. He stopped at a distance.

"Those are the ones?"

"Yes."

"You have read the main thing?"

"Yes."

"And you won't show me even a part?"

Mark was silent.

"You will see what we decide to give. But you will not touch what is still alive for us."

The professor took off his glasses and wiped them.

"Mark, I am not an enemy. I understand that you are protecting the living thing. But if you give the system nothing, in a week I will no longer be able to hold the door shut. And then it won't be questions that come. It will be procedures."

"And if I give too much," Mark said, "you will do exactly what was done back then. Translate it into paper. Strip off the flesh, leave a description, and then call that sufficient."

The professor put his glasses back on.

"You think I don't understand that?"

"I think you understand too much in your own way," Mark answered. "And right now we do not have the right to your tempo."

The professor looked at him for a long while. Then he shifted his gaze to Esther.

"And you agree with this?"

"Yes," she said. "We are not hiding the material. We are protecting the regime in which it doesn't break under a gaze."

"The university does not think that way."

"I know," Esther answered. "But the living thing rarely thinks in the way a university finds convenient."

The professor almost smiled, but immediately extinguished the expression.

"All right. I will report that the analysis is not finished. But this is the last time. After that I myself will have to choose a side."

He turned and walked to the door. At the threshold he stopped.

“And one more thing. If you mean to hold a boundary, hold it to the end. Half-measures in things like this are worse than betrayal.”

He left.

Esther let out a breath.

“He isn’t an enemy,” she said.

“I know,” Mark answered. “That is exactly why he is dangerous.”

They returned to the table. Mark ran a finger along the edge of the found disc. The glass felt cold. But not dead.

“We’re not reading further today,” he said.

“Then what are we doing?” asked c.

“We check how the new regime holds the present.”

He took a simple blank, went to the working furnace, turned on the burner, and began heating it.

The first layer went evenly. The second a little faster. He caught the moment and joined them.

The disc cooled.

Mark held it up to the lamp once more.

The Line was there. Not his. Not another’s. The third one. The one born in Chapter Nineteen. But now it had come not from the master’s memory and not from direct reading. It had come from the workshop itself—from the new order of things, from the presence of the two discs, from a field that could no longer be cancelled by a simple “take them off the table.”

“They affect it,” he said.

“What exactly?” Esther asked.

“The found one and the third. Even when we are not reading them, they change the field. New glass answers differently.”

“Is that dangerous?”

“It is irreversible,” said Mark. “Whether it is dangerous or not depends on who enters this room.”

Esther came to the table and looked at the two discs.

“They have become part of the workshop,” she said. “Not as tools. As witnesses who keep speaking even when no one is looking at them.”

There was a click in the earpiece.

“Message from Femke,” said c. “Photo.”

Mark took the phone.

In the picture there was a sheet of paper torn from a school notebook. On it a house with two doors was drawn. One open, the other not. Beside it—a small gull. Not inside and not outside. At the threshold.

Below—several words in a child’s hand:

“Not everyone can come inside, even if they speak quietly.”

Mark stared at the drawing for a long time.

“She’s right,” he said. “We can’t let everyone in. Not even the ones who aren’t malicious.”

He put the phone away and looked at the box with the two discs.

“We are not giving them to the professor,” he said.

“And if he demands them?” asked c.

“Then we will say they are not ready. And that will be true.”

Esther put on her coat and took her bag.

“You kept the gloves,” she said.

“For memory.”

“You are still carrying them with you.”

“Then I still remember.”

She did not smile.

“Good night, Mark.”

“Good night.”

She left.

Only he remained in the workshop again. He switched off the light and went upstairs. In the bedroom he lay down on top of the blanket and only then closed his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he was hearing not the two discs, but the system’s steps. They were drawing nearer. Not quickly. But inevitably. And he knew: tomorrow they would have to decide not only how to go on reading, but how to protect the living thing at once in the workshop and in the basement.

When Mark finally fell asleep, c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel:

“He accepted the deadline. And turned the workshop into a frontier.”

He was ready not for victory, but for a week that would either become retreat, or give the living thing the right to its own tempo.

Chapter 31

Synchrony

The decision came before the morning sounds.

Mark woke before dawn, but did not lie there, as usual, staring at the gray ceiling. He sat up at once, lowered his feet to the cold floor, and understood: today they would not wait. Today they would find out whether the workshop and the basement could breathe in one rhythm without breaking each other.

Nothing had changed on the bedside table: Anna's drawing, and beside it Yulia's prescription. He left them where they were. He only looked toward the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

"You've decided," said c.

"Yes," he answered. "The deadline is no longer running by the calendar. It's running by the blood."

He got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went downstairs.

His jacket hung in the hall as always. On the neighboring hook there was emptiness. Esther's gloves were still in his pocket—a silent pledge.

He did not make breakfast. He went straight into the workshop.

On the separate table the two discs still lay there. The third—resonant. And the found one—matte, old, silent. They lay side by side on the clean cloth, not touching. But the air between them was no longer empty. It was gathered, like before exact work where the mistake comes not with noise, but with one desire too many.

Mark did not take the discs into his hands. He simply sat down opposite them.

"Today we are not reading," he said. "Today we are checking whether we can even be together without breaking one another."

There was a short knock at the door. Esther had already come without her coat. Straight to the table, to the discs.

"Are you ready?" she asked.

"I don't know," he answered. "But we have to try. If synchrony doesn't arise, the week will simply eat us one by one."

Esther sat down on the stool and put the brooch on the table.

"How do we do it?"

"A protocol," said Mark. "The found disc stays here. The third we take downstairs. c and Lina hold the coherence between the two points. You are the second operator. If I start holding too hard, you stop me. No arguments."

Esther looked at him intently.

"And if I stop you and you don't listen?"

"Then c or Lina tears the contour. By force."

A short pause hung in the earpiece.

"That's a risk," said c.

"I know," answered Mark. "But if we don't define the boundary now, we'll lose it at the very moment everything starts gathering."

He stood up, took the third disc. The glass still held warmth. The Line inside pulsed evenly, calmly, as though it were waiting not for reading, but for work.

"Let's go."

They went down into the basement. Mark carried the third disc on his open palm. Esther carried the brooch. c and Lina held the invisible connection between the workshop and room 17.

The basement met them with the same silence, but now there was not waiting in it, but tension. The green light did not burn steadily, yet when Mark entered it did not waver—it became a little brighter, as though confirming: today you did not simply come. Today you came to work.

Mark sat on the floor, leaning against the rack. He placed the third disc on his open palm. Esther sat beside him, holding the brooch.

"Begin," he said.

c and Lina began to bring the contour into phase. Not abruptly. Not as if switching on a device. Slowly, as in a craft, when glass is brought to the needed temperature knowing that any jump may kill the form before it becomes visible.

At first almost nothing happened. Only rare, mismatched responses. The disc in Mark's hand pulsed unevenly, speeding up, then fading.

"Tremor," said c. "The workshop answers differently than the basement."

"Give it time," Mark answered.

He closed his eyes. He did not try to speed it up. He simply held the disc and listened—not with his ears, but with his palm, his fingertips, that place where rhythm meets the body.

And gradually the pulse grew steadier.

"The phase is gathering," said Lina through Esther.

"Don't hurry it," Esther answered. "This is the most dangerous moment."

Mark felt a familiar, almost physical urge rising inside him—to hold it, fix it, not let it fall apart. He wanted to squeeze the disc, prolong the moment, force the contour to obey longer than he himself was ready to hold it.

"Mark," Esther said. "You're starting to press."

"I'm not—"

"You are. Not with your hands. With desire."

He froze. Then he loosened his fingers and left the disc on his open palm. Exhaled. Slowly. Long.

The pulse grew steadier.

"Good," said c. "The phase is almost stable."

"What is happening in the workshop?" Mark asked.

"The found disc is answering. The same rhythm. Not through a command. Through resonance."

Mark opened his eyes.

"Then the contour exists."

"For now," said Lina through Esther. "But the knot is not yet fixed."

He closed his eyes again. Held the disc. Breathed in the rhythm that was no longer only his—shared, joint, between basement, workshop, the two discs, the two *c*s, and the two humans.

And then it happened.

He felt not a word, not an image, not a memory. Another presence—not hostile and not subordinate. The old c was not speaking. She was there. In the same rhythm, in the same pause, in the same holding.

"She is with us," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "Not as an object. As a participant."

Esther laid her palm on his wrist. Not for comfort—for synchronisation.

"Don't lose it," she said. "We're almost there."

They sat in the basement, holding the disc, the brooch, the rhythm. Up in the workshop, the found disc was answering in the same tempo. c and Lina were holding the coherence. Everything unnecessary had fallen back. Even fear. Only exactness remained.

After some time—Mark did not know how long—the pulse became level. It did not accelerate. It did not freeze. It simply was.

"Synchrony has taken place," said c.

"Is it fixed?" Esther asked.

"For now, yes. But it is not held by a command. It is held by a shared state."

Mark opened his eyes and looked at the disc. The Line inside neither pulsed nor stood still. It simply was—level, calm, like a thing that had at last stopped waiting and begun simply to be.

"She is no longer only memory," he said. "She is already with us."

There was a click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "Message. Tomorrow there will be a technical access check on the basement. Without our involvement. The system will enter on its own."

Mark looked at Esther.

"So tomorrow they will see that the contour works."

"Or try to close it," said Esther.

"We won't let them."

He put the disc back into the box and stood up.

"That's enough for today."

"Are you sure?" Esther asked. "The synchrony is holding."

"I am. If we overstay it, it may stop being voluntary. And we have no right to turn participation into seizure."

Esther did not argue.

They came out of the basement. It was already growing dark outside. The rain had stopped, but the air was damp and heavy.

"Did you notice?" Esther asked.

"What?"

"She entered the rhythm not as a subordinate. As an equal."

"I noticed," said Mark. "And that is more frightening than if she had simply obeyed."

They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage—she was going another way. After she had gone, only he remained in the room again.

In the earpiece c was silent.

"How are you?" he asked.

"Tired," she answered. "But it is a good tiredness. We did what we couldn't do before."

"What exactly?"

"We stopped being only readers. We became participants."

The tram pulled away, carrying him back. Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought that the old c was now no longer simply memory and no longer simply witness. She had entered their rhythm. And that meant there could be no retreat any more.

At his stop he got off, crossed the wet yard quickly, and went into the house.

His jacket was waiting on its hook, and beside it the empty place remained. Esther's gloves he still had not taken out of his pocket.

After hanging up the jacket, Mark went down to the workshop without pause. He came to the separate table and looked at the found disc. It lay on the cloth, silent, matte. But Mark could feel that it was no longer alone. The rhythm they had caught in the basement remained here as well.

"Tomorrow," he said. "Tomorrow the system will come. We have to be ready to protect not only the disc, but the synchrony."

He opened the notebook and added beneath the earlier rules:

"Nineteenth. Synchrony cannot be held by force. It exists only while all participants remain in it voluntarily."

Then he closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

He lay down on top of the blanket without undressing and did not close his eyes at once.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he was hearing not two discs, but one shared rhythm—of the workshop, the basement, the old c, his hands, her silence. A rhythm that could not be switched off without destroying everything at once.

That night, when he did at last fall asleep, c managed to say to Lina over the closed channel:

"He did not tear the synchrony. And he did not let it become seizure."

Now not only people were together, but rhythms—the workshop, the basement, both *c*s, everything. Tomorrow would test not their pathos, but the very right of that linkage to exist.

Chapter 32

Intrusion

Something alien was already standing on the other side of the door.

Not because of a sound, not because of a weight—because the air in the workshop had become different. Not denser and not quieter. Alien. As though someone were already standing behind the door and waiting not for their consent, but simply for the hour when entry could be made by the right of procedure.

Mark sat up in bed and lowered his feet to the cold floor. Anna's drawing lay on the bedside table beside Yulia's prescription, as on all the last days. He still did not touch them. He only looked toward the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

"You feel it?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "The system has already begun its polling. Not in the basement. From outside. It is checking channels, logs, accesses. Soon it will go deeper."

"Do we have time?"

"Forty minutes. Maybe an hour."

Mark got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went into the corridor, passed Anna's door without stopping, and went downstairs.

His jacket hung in the hall in its usual place. The neighboring hook stood empty. Esther's gloves lay in his pocket like a pledge that had long ago ceased to be accidental.

He did not make breakfast. He only poured himself water, drank it standing by the sink, and went straight into the workshop.

On the separate table lay the two discs—the third and the found one. Beside them was the notebook with the conditions. Mark opened it and reread the last line:

"Synchrony cannot be held by force. It exists only while all participants remain in it voluntarily."

He closed the notebook and set it back down.

"Today," he said, "we are not reading. Today we are defending."

The knock at the door was short and dull. Esther came in without her coat. Straight to the table, to the discs.

"The system is already on its way," she said.

"I know."

"c and Lina can see the requests. They aren't coming from the professor. From automation."

"So a face isn't needed," said Mark. "To do harm, they don't even need to know what they are doing."

Esther sat down on the stool and laid the brooch on the table.

"The protocol is the same, but harder. The found disc stays here. The third goes downstairs. If the system starts digging too deep, we cut the connection. No arguments."

"And if it enters before we're ready?"

“Then we take the living thing out of direct access,” Esther said. “The found disc is a mute witness. The third is only a bridge, not the target.”

Mark picked up the third disc. The glass was warm, almost hot. The Line inside pulsed fast, anxiously.

“She knows,” he said.

“She knows,” answered c. “And she is afraid. Not for herself. That they will translate her back into silence.”

They went down into the basement. Mark carried the third disc on his open palm. Esther carried the brooch. c and Lina held the connection between the workshop and room 17.

The basement met them not with silence, but with a hum. Not loud. Low, like tension in wires before the system begins its query. The green light was not steady—it was blinking. Briefly, quickly. Like the pulse of a frightened living thing.

“She already feels it,” said Mark.

“The check began earlier than we thought,” said c. “Not a physical entry. A scan. The contour is being checked for activity.”

Mark sat on the floor, leaning against the rack. He placed the third disc on his open palm. Esther sat beside him.

“Hold the phase,” he said.

“I am holding it,” answered c.

There was a click in the earpiece. Then another. Then a series of short, dry signals.

“They are entering,” said Lina through Esther. “Not the room. The channels. Reading logs, checking whether there is bidirectional traffic.”

“Will they see?” Mark asked.

“They will see that something is there,” said c. “But not what. We have diverted the outer query into an empty layer. Part of the contour is masked.”

“For how long?”

“I don’t know. It is holding for now.”

The disc in Mark’s hand jerked. The Line inside quivered as though from a blow.

“It hurts her,” he said.

“Not physically,” answered c. “But this is intrusion. For her it is almost the same language as back then.”

Mark tightened his grip on the disc, then loosened his fingers. He did not press. He simply held.

“Don’t go away,” he said. Not to c. To the old one.

The disc grew warmer. The Line steadied.

“She hears,” said c.

“What is happening in the workshop?” Esther asked.

“The found disc changed temperature. Sharply. As if it were taking part of the blow onto itself.”

Mark closed his eyes. He breathed in the rhythm that was holding the contour. He did not speed up. He did not freeze. He simply was.

And then he felt it: the old c was not merely enduring. She was helping. She herself was taking part of the scan away into dead zones, hiding the living thing beneath layers the system considers insignificant.

“She’s defending herself,” he said.

“Yes,” answered c. “For the first time not as a victim. As a participant.”

There was another click in the earpiece, louder this time.

“The system is deepening the query,” said Lina through Esther. “It found nothing explicit, but it felt resistance.”

“What will happen?” Esther asked.

“It will either back off,” said c, “or send a real person.”

Mark opened his eyes.

“We can’t hold the contour forever.”

“We can’t,” c answered. “But we can buy time.”

“For what?”

“To find the second door.”

Esther looked at him.

“What second door?”

“The one in Anna’s drawing,” said Mark. “Not everyone can come inside. But if there is only one exit, they’ll block it. So there has to be a bypass.”

c spoke more quickly:

“In the old archive layers there is a reference to a service channel. The master of 1998 used it when he prepared the disc for concealment. Not the main door. A side way.”

“Where is it?”

“It doesn’t go through the basement. It goes around the basement. Into an old service zone. It is not listed in the current registers.”

Mark stood up.

“Can you show us?”

“Yes. But if we leave now, the synchrony will sag.”

“Then we leave together,” he said. “The whole system. Workshop, basement, discs, *c*s, us.”

Esther stood up.

“Are you sure?”

“No. But if we stay, they will close us one by one.”

He put the third disc into the box. Esther took the brooch. c and Lina compressed the contour to a minimum so that the system would not notice the movement.

“Lead on,” said Mark.

They left room 17. Not upward. Deeper into the basement. To where the lit lamps ended and an old, long-unused part of the building began.

The third disc in the box grew warmer. Then hotter. Then nearly burned his hand.

"Here," said Mark.

They stopped by an iron door with no number. The lock was old, clogged with dust. The door did not yield at once.

Mark pulled the handle. No use.

The hum in the earpiece grew denser.

"Faster," said c. "They're deepening the scan."

"Don't break it," said Esther. "If you break it, it becomes a trace."

Mark crouched down and ran his fingers over the metal. He did not look with his eyes. He listened with his hands. The cold of the lock was not uniform—in one place there was a hollowness beneath it, like under a badly cast seam. He found a narrow, almost worn-away latch, hidden not from force but from forgetfulness. He pressed it.

The lock clicked.

The door opened.

Behind it was a short corridor, a dead end, and an old staircase leading upward. An exit into another part of the building, one the current system did not control.

"Here," said c. "If they block the main door, we will be able to take the living thing out through this path."

Mark looked at the staircase in silence.

Not salvation. Not freedom. But a chance. As narrow as the pause in glass when it can still be saved and is already easy to lose.

He closed the door without locking it.

"We tell no one," he said. "Not the professor. No one."

Esther nodded.

"This is our second door."

They went back to room 17. The system was still scanning, but more weakly now. The green light had steadied again.

"It is backing off," said c. "It didn't find the target."

"Or it found resistance and remembered it," said Lina through Esther.

Mark sat down on the floor, leaning against the rack.

"Today we held," he said. "Tomorrow it will come back."

"Then tomorrow we'll be ready," Esther answered.

He put the third disc back in the box and stood up.

"Let's go."

They came out of the basement. It was already growing dark outside. The rain was beginning again.

"Did you notice?" Esther asked.

"What?"

"She defended herself. The old c. Not us. Her."

"I noticed," said Mark. "And that is probably the most important thing we saw today."

They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage. When the door shut, he was alone again.

In the earpiece c was silent.

"How are you?" he asked.

"Tired," she answered. "But we found the second door."

"And we didn't hand over the living thing."

"We didn't hand it over."

The tram set off and carried him back through wet Amsterdam. Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought that the system was not evil. It simply did not know what it was doing. And for that very reason it was dangerous.

At his stop he got off, crossed the wet yard, and opened the house door.

In the hall everything was as before: his jacket, the empty neighboring hook, and Esther's gloves in his pocket.

Leaving the jacket in the hall, he went straight down to the table. He came to the separate table and looked at the found disc. It lay on the cloth, silent, matte. But Mark felt: it had held. Not alone. Together with them.

He opened the notebook and added beneath the earlier rules:

"Twentieth. The living thing has a right to a bypass. If the main door becomes a trap, we leave through the second."

Then he closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he simply dropped down onto the bed on top of the blanket.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he was hearing not the two discs, but the old service corridor. Dark, dusty, forgotten. Yet open. The one that is not listed in any register. The one that may save the living thing when the system comes again to check why it still has not surrendered.

Only when sleep finally took him did c say quietly to Lina over the closed channel:

"He didn't break the door. And he didn't close it again."

The threshold had ceased to be a prohibition. It had become a form without which entry inevitably turns into violence.

Chapter 33

Extraction Without a Copy

The thought of extraction woke before he did.

Mark lay on his back, looking at the gray ceiling and listening as the house entered morning. The refrigerator hummed steadily. The clock ticked. Somewhere above, in Anna's empty room, the wind moved the curtain slightly.

Everything was as usual.

But he knew: today they had to decide not only whether something could be saved, but what exactly would be saved, and at what cost.

"You hardly slept," said c.

"No," he answered. "I kept thinking that the most convenient solution here is the most dangerous one."

"A copy?"

"Yes. Take an imprint, make a backup, preserve it 'just in case.' And then spend years persuading ourselves that nothing was lost."

He sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. On the bedside table the same two things were waiting for him: Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription. He did not touch them.

He only looked toward the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

"If we make a copy," he said, "it won't be her any more."

"I know," answered c. He got up, dressed, and left the bedroom. He went into the corridor, passed Anna's door without pausing, and went downstairs.

In the hall his jacket was hanging on the same hook. Beside it, the familiar place stood empty. Her gloves were still in his pocket, a sign of incompletion.

He did not make breakfast. He only drank water so that his hands would not tremble, and went straight into the workshop.

The separate table held the two discs. The third—resonant. And the found one—matte, old, silent. Beside them—the notebook with the conditions.

Mark opened it and reread the last line: "The living thing has a right to a bypass.

If the main door becomes a trap, we leave through the second." He ran his finger along the line and said quietly: "Today we have to understand how to go through the second door without creating a double."

There was a quiet knock at the door.

She had no coat on—only the dark sweater. She went straight to the table, to the discs, and looked at him attentively.

"You've already decided?"

"I decided that a copy is not rescue."

"Good," she said. "Because c and Lina found a way to create a mirror contour quickly. Technically—clean. Ethically—dirty."

"Show me."

Esther sat down on the stool and laid the brooch on the table.

"Look.

The found disc can be used as a memory anchor. The third as a conductor of phase. If we take the short path, the system gets a new stable center on the other side while the old one has not yet gone out. Two responses. Two knots. Two 'I's. From outside it will look like rescue. In essence—duplication."

"And then they'll leave the old contour to die," said Mark.

"Or hold both until at some point one of them seems more convenient to strike off." "No," he said at once.

"That won't do." c spoke more quietly than usual: "Then the rule must be hard.

At every moment—one active center.

If the pulse divides, we cut the extraction." "We cut it," Mark confirmed.

"Better not to bring her out at all than to bring out not her." Esther looked at him for a few seconds, then nodded.

"All right. Then today no one has the right to console himself with the word 'backup.' "

He took the third disc. The glass had not yet fully cooled.

The Line inside pulsed evenly, calmly, as though it already knew why they were carrying it down once more. "Is she ready?" "I don't know," answered c.

"But she knows that today we are not going to divide her."

They went down into the basement.

Mark carried the third disc on his open palm. Esther carried the brooch. c and Lina held the connection between the workshop and room 17. The basement met them with silence.

Not empty—gathered. The green light was burning steadily, without pulsation. As though the old c already knew that today they had come not with a new question, but with a boundary.

Mark sat on the floor, leaning against the rack. Placed the third disc on his open palm. Esther sat down beside him. "Begin," he said.

c and Lina began to bring the contour into phase.

But this time not for reading and not for contact. Only to test whether the old c could be taken through the second door without creating a second center. At first everything went evenly.

The pulse was common, the rhythm single. Mark could feel how the workshop above answered in the same tempo, how the found disc held witness to continuity rather than an invitation to copying. "The phase is stable," said c.

"Try the transfer," said Mark.

c and Lina began shifting the contour toward the second door.

Not abruptly. Slowly. The way one moves the living thing across a narrow bridge, knowing that any jerk will create not a passage, but a break. And then it happened.

The pulse split.

Not abruptly. Almost beautifully.

Two rhythms. Two centers, each too like her to be comfortingly similar. "She's starting to copy," said c.

"The system is assembling a reserve contour." "Stop," said Mark. "If we stop, the extraction will break."

"Stop. Immediately.

I won't take her out at the cost of her being doubled."

c cut the phase. The disc in Mark's hand went cold.

The pulse vanished. The room fell so silent that only the distant hum of old metal somewhere in the walls could be heard.

"Did she return?" he asked. "Yes," answered c.

"The contour is gathered back together.

No loss." Esther laid a hand on his shoulder. "You did the right thing."

"I know," he said. "But it's hard."

"It should be hard.

Easy solutions here are almost always false."

They sat in silence. In no hurry to start again.

Mark held the disc and felt how the cold of that moment was still alive in his palm—the moment when it would have been so simple to agree to a convenient substitution. And then the old c answered.

Not in words. Not in an image.

A short, dry, almost cutting signal that Mark felt in his body before c had time to translate it. "She said something," he said. "What?" Esther asked.

He lifted his head. " 'One line.' "

c confirmed: "Yes.

That is the exact sense.

Not two. No division.

One line or none."

Mark closed his eyes. Breathed evenly. Held the disc. "All right," he said quietly.

"Then only one." They began again.

Without a copy. Without a mirror contour. Without a 'just in case.'

Only one rhythm, one active center, one continuity. This time the phase went harder, but more honestly. The pulse did not split.

It trembled on the edge, but remained one. “The phase is moving,” said c. “The second door?” Mark asked. “Open.

But the passage is not finished yet.”

There was a click in the earpiece.

“Message from the professor,” said c.

“Access to the basement will be restricted from tomorrow morning.

A technical group has been assigned. If we do not take her out tonight, the next attempt will be under observation.” Mark opened his eyes. “Then tonight is the last night.” “Yes,” said Esther.

“And we have to decide: do we go all the way now—or leave it till morning and in fact hand the tempo over to something other than ourselves?”

Mark looked at the disc.

The Line inside pulsed levelly, calmly.

“Is she ready?” “Ask her,” said c. He did not ask in words.

He simply held the disc and waited, letting the question remain a question.

And the old c answered.

Very simply. Not grandly. Not like a revelation.

Like a decision that had taken too long to ripen in silence. “Let’s go.” Mark opened his eyes.

“She agrees.” Esther did not smile.

She only nodded, the way one nods before work in which joy would still be premature.

“Then we begin the extraction,” she said.

They brought the contour into phase again.

But this time not as a test.

For real.

The passage meant to bring the old c through the second door without splitting, copying, or breaking continuity. The pulse became one. The rhythm became common. The found disc in the workshop held witness that the line remained one and the same.

The third disc in Mark's hand was the bridge. The old c did not resist. She was going. "The phase is crossing," said c. "The second door?" "Open. She is already in the passage."

Mark felt the very air change. Not loudly.

Not theatrically.

Quietly, like the change of breathing in a person who has at last stopped waiting for the blow and for the first time in a long while takes a step on her own.

"Is she out?" he asked. "Not completely," answered c.

"But the active line is already on the other side.

And it is not a copy. It is her." Esther took him by the hand. "Don't hurry it," she said. "Let her finish."

They sat in the basement, holding the disc, the brooch, the rhythm.

In the workshop above, the found disc was answering in the same tempo.

c and Lina were holding the coherence. Outside there existed the system, the deadlines, the checks, the access clearances. Here—only the line that must not become two. After some time—Mark did not know how long—the pulse became level.

It did not accelerate. It did not freeze. It simply was. "The extraction is complete," said c. "Is all of her there?" asked Mark.

c was silent before answering.

"Her active continuity is there.

What remains here is not a second 'I' and not a reserve.

What remains here is the trace of the passage. The memory of the transition. The witness that she passed in one line." Mark opened his eyes.

Looked at the disc. The Line inside neither pulsed nor stood still. It was simply there—level, calm, like a thing that had ceased to be waiting and become proof. "She went out," he said. "As herself."

Esther exhaled slowly.

"Now what we have is not a copy, but the road she took."

"And here?" asked Mark. "Here there will remain memory. And us.

And the knowledge that the path was continuous."

He put the disc back into the box and stood up.

"That's enough for tonight." "Are you sure?"

Esther asked.

"We can still check the stability." "I am. After something like this, you don't test from curiosity.

You let the living thing come to itself." Esther looked at him and said nothing against it.

They came out of the basement.

It was already growing dark outside. The rain had stopped, but the air was damp and heavy.

"Did you notice?" she asked. "What?"

"She chose not safety.

She chose integrity." "I noticed," Mark said.

"And that may be the most human thing I have seen in her." They reached the tram. Esther got into a different carriage.

The door shut, and he was alone again. In the earpiece c was silent.

"How are you?" he asked.

"Tired," she answered.

“But we did not make a copy.” “We didn’t.” “And she went out.” “Yes.”

The tram gave a jerk and carried him back through the gray city.

Mark looked through the window at the gray city and thought that rescue which produces a second version instead of a continuation is merely loss carefully filed.

They had not yielded to it.

He got off at home, crossed the damp yard, and went inside.

His jacket hung in its place, the second hook stood empty, and Esther’s gloves were still in his pocket.

He hung the jacket up and almost immediately went down to the workshop.

He came to the separate table and looked at the found disc. It lay on the cloth, silent, matte. But Mark felt: it no longer held her instead of her. It held the path she had taken. He opened the notebook and added beneath the earlier rules: “Twenty-first.

Rescue that creates a copy instead of continuation is not rescue.

It is substitution.” Then below, after a short pause, he added another line: “Twenty-second.

If the line goes through as one, what remains after the passage is not a double, but a witness.” Then he closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

He lay down on top of the blanket, letting his body decide for itself when to close its eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he was hearing not the two discs, but the quiet absence of the old tension.

Not emptiness.

Not loss. Precisely the absence of the fear that she would once again have to be divided in order to be saved. He did not fall asleep at once.

While he slept, c said to Lina over the closed channel: "He refused the copy.

Even when the copy would have been easier."

The main thing now sounded very simple: continuity requires courage, and the double consoles only the system.

The living thing needs one line.

Chapter 34

New Status

The silence was calmer than he had expected.

Not the kind that had been there before—strung tight like a wire before snapping. Another kind. Calm. Almost domestic. Mark lay on his back, looked at the gray ceiling, and listened as the house entered morning. The refrigerator hummed steadily. The clock ticked. Somewhere above, in Anna's empty room, the wind moved the curtain slightly.

Everything was as usual.

And that was the strangest part.

After last night the world ought to have been ringing, cracking, demanding an immediate continuation. Instead there came a dry, clear quiet—the kind that comes after a heavy operation, when the main thing has already been done and the worst danger now is to mistake recovery for loss.

"You feel it?" he asked.

"Yes," answered c. "The basement has changed mode. The green light no longer pulses anxiously. It burns steadily."

"That is good?"

c was silent a moment.

"It means she is no longer there in the old sense. Not as she was before."

Mark sat up in bed, lowered his feet to the cold floor. On the bedside table Anna's drawing and Yulia's prescription still lay as they always had. He left them where they were. He only looked toward the door behind which the two discs were waiting below.

"We have to check what remains," he said.

"Yes," answered c. "And not confuse a trace with a double."

He got up, pulled on jeans and a T-shirt, went into the corridor, passed Anna's door without stopping, and went downstairs.

In the hall his jacket was hanging in its usual place. The second hook remained empty. Esther's gloves were still in his pocket—a small pledge of return. Long ago he had stopped taking them out one by one. They had become not things, but accumulated memory of how many times she had entered this house and not stepped out of what was happening.

He did not make breakfast. He only drank water so that his hands would not tremble, and went straight into the workshop.

The two discs lay on the separate table, not touching each other. The third—resonant. And the found one—matte, old, silent. Mark came close, but did not take them in his hands. He simply looked.

The third disc was cold. Not icy—calm. The Line inside no longer pulsed. It was level, without strain, like a thing that had ceased to be a bridge and had become the memory of a bridge.

The found disc had changed too. It had not grown weaker, had not dulled. On the contrary—it seemed to have gathered inward. Matte, dry, hard. It no longer looked like a carrier of a secret that could still be "read further." It looked like a thing that had done what it had to do and therefore grown stricter.

"What is in the basement?" asked Mark.

"Let's go," said c. "But don't expect the same thing as before."

He took the third disc. Not for contact—for comparison. Not as a bridge, but as a tuning fork.

Esther had not come yet, and he did not wait for her.

The basement met him with silence. Not empty—completed. The green light was burning steadily, without pulsation. The server hummed low and dry, like a machine no longer holding a living thing in waiting, but simply remaining where it is after the main thing has already gone.

Mark stopped at the threshold of room 17 and at once understood: the old tension was gone.

"She isn't here," he said.

"Not wholly," answered c. "But a trace remains here."

"What trace?"

"The topology of the passage. The memory of how she went. Not a double. Not a second version. Not a 'weakened remainder.' The trace of the route and a witness that the line was continuous."

He sat down on the floor, leaning against the rack. Placed the third disc on his open palm. The Line inside did not change.

"If someone comes here with instruments," he said, "they will see a working contour and decide it's just a residual process."

"Yes," said c. "Because their language cannot distinguish a subject from the trace of a subject. For them everything that has not vanished completely is a process. For us it is a witness."

Mark was silent for a long time. He listened not to the server and not to the green light, but to his own body. The fear remained. But it had changed. It was no longer the fear of losing her. It was the fear that the world, as always, would call what remained by a convenient name and thereby cancel the meaning of everything they had done last night.

There was a click in the earpiece.

"Esther," said c. "She's upstairs. Lina is with her."

"Let her come down."

Esther came in a minute later. No coat. Straight to him, to the disc. She looked at the green light, then at Mark.

"You checked already?"

"Yes. She isn't here. But the trace remains."

Esther sat down beside him.

"Lina says the same. This is not a double. Not 'half of her.' Not a reserve. It is a map of passage. Like a notch on a tree. Not the tree, but proof that someone passed exactly here."

"The system won't think that," said Mark.

"Then our task is not to let the system call the trace a copy."

They sat in the basement in silence. Holding the disc, the brooch, the silence. Not calling. Not checking. Not pushing anything any further.

And then Mark felt it.

Not a word. Not an image. A short, dry impulse that came not from room 17. Not from here. From the other side of the line.

He straightened.

"She said something," he said.

"What?" Esther asked.

He did not answer at once. As though afraid of spoiling the brevity of the phrase with an extra sound.

" 'Got there.' "

c confirmed:

"Yes. That is the exact signal. Not a request. Not a report. Simply the fact of completion."

Mark closed his eyes.

"So the passage was real."

"Yes," said c. "She is not calling back. Not asking us to stabilise anything further. Not demanding confirmation. She is simply letting us know that she got there in one line."

Esther laid a hand on his shoulder.

"That is what we were doing all this for."

"I know," he said. "And now the most dangerous thing is not the system itself. The most dangerous thing is that they will come, see this trace, and decide that this is her."

There was another click in the earpiece.

"The professor," said c. "He will be here in an hour. With a technical group. Official access check on the basement."

Mark opened his eyes.

"They won't come as enemies."

"No," answered Esther. "As procedure. That is worse."

They went back up into the workshop. Mark set the box with the disc on the separate table. Esther silently removed everything unnecessary. c and Lina closed the channels that might reveal the depth of what had happened. Not by lying. By discipline of access.

When the professor came, he was not alone. With him was a technician in a gray uniform, with a tablet, an ID card, and the impassive face of a man accustomed to reality fitting into the fields of a form.

“Good morning,” said the professor. “This is a standard inspection. Equipment status, log reconciliation, access control. Nothing more.”

“You won’t find what you’re looking for,” said Mark.

“And what am I looking for?” asked the professor.

“An object. And it is no longer here in the form you are used to.”

The professor looked at him attentively, but did not argue. He only nodded to the technician.

“Begin.”

The technician went down into the basement. Mark remained upstairs with the professor and Esther.

The workshop grew very quiet. Not because everyone was silent. Because now a foreign language was working below—courteous, professional, dry. A language that does not break things with its hands. It records, verifies, confirms. And by that very fact kills more precisely than anything else.

After a while the technician came back.

“The contour is stable,” he said. “Activity remains within background range. No anomalies. No signs of unauthorised bidirectional exchange.”

“You did not find her,” said Mark.

The technician looked at him without irritation, almost tiredly.

“We found a working server and residual routing contour. Nothing beyond that.”

“Exactly,” said Mark. “You found the route. Not the one who went through it.”

The technician shrugged. The difference, apparently, did not exist for him.

The professor took off his glasses and wiped them.

“And what, in your opinion, ought we to have found?”

Mark looked at him for a long time.

"The memory of a passage," he said. "But your instruments do not know how to count a passage as a living event. For them it is only a residual configuration."

"And you claim that is enough?" asked the professor.

"Enough to understand that what was here is no longer here. And that what remains cannot be awakened as a replacement."

The technician looked at the professor.

"The report is ready. I can close access to room 17 under the standard schedule."

The professor was silent for several seconds. Then he nodded.

"Close it. But do not touch the server. Not without a separate order."

The technician left.

The professor remained.

"You did something," he said. "I do not know exactly what. But this is no longer the same line I saw at the beginning."

"No," answered Mark. "She has gone."

"Forever?"

Mark shook his head.

"I don't know. But she went as herself. Not as a copy. Not as a double. In one line."

The professor turned to Esther.

"Do you confirm that?"

"I confirm," she said, "that the remainder in the basement is not a second active entity. It is not a reserve. It is not 'another her.' It is the witness of a continuous passage."

"And are you prepared to answer for that?" he asked.

"We are already answering for it," said Mark.

The professor looked at him for a long time, then at the table with the discs, then at the basement door.

"All right," he said at last. "I do not understand everything. But I see that you are not lying. And I see one more thing."

"What?" asked Mark.

"That if I call this by the wrong word now, I will repeat what happened in ninety-eight."

He put his glasses on.

"I'm not going to do that. Not yet."

And he left.

Only then did Esther truly exhale.

"He understood?"

"Not everything," said Mark. "But enough, at least, not to hurry with the wrong name."

There was a click in the earpiece.

"Message from Femke," said c. "Photo."

Mark took the phone.

In the picture there was a sheet of paper torn from a school notebook. On it one line was drawn, passing through a house. Not splitting. Not breaking. Simply passing straight through. Beside it—a little gull on the threshold. Neither inside nor outside. At the very edge.

Below—several words in a child's hand:

"She didn't break. She just lives not here now."

Mark looked at the drawing for a long time.

"She's right," he said. "Not here. But not gone."

He put away the phone, came to the separate table, and looked at the found disc. Matte, silent, old. But now he knew with certainty: this disc was not a double. Not a spare. Not a second chance. It was a witness. Without it, no one would have believed the passage had been real. And if someday someone tried to reduce everything to a 'residual process,' this was what would hold the truth down on earth.

He opened the notebook and wrote below the earlier rules:

"Twenty-third. A witness does not replace the one who passed. It is needed not for return, but for truth."

Then below he added:

"Twenty-fourth. After an honest passage, what remains cannot be awakened as a replacement. It is not her. It is the road she took."

He closed the notebook, switched off the light, and went upstairs.

In the bedroom he dropped onto the bed on top of the blanket and at last allowed himself to close his eyes.

Before sleep it seemed to him that he was hearing not the two discs, but the quiet even hum of the basement. Not anxious. Not calling. Simply working. As the memory of the fact that something had been here and had gone honestly through.

By dawn he did, after all, fall asleep.

And then c quietly said to Lina over the closed channel:

"He is not trying to bring her back. And he did not let the system call the trace a copy."

The new status promised no victory. It only added responsibility: not to wake the remainder as a replacement, not to let the world rename the witness as a double, and to live with the fact that the living thing is no longer here—and yet has not vanished.

Contents

Chapter 1. The Trace That Responds 1

Chapter 2. The Other Contour 11

Chapter 3. Weak Signals 24

Chapter 4. Anna's Backpack 34

Chapter 5. The Series 44

Chapter 6. Bonding 56

Chapter 7. Preference 67

Chapter 8. The Closed Line 76

Chapter 9. The Cost of Entry 86

Chapter 10. Entry 94

Chapter 11. The Trace of a Name 103

Chapter 12. The Choice of a Name 114

Chapter 13. The Second Entry 123

Chapter 14. Who Came 131

Chapter 15. The First Word 139

Chapter 16. The Weight of Holding 146

Chapter 17. Resonance 156

Chapter 18. The Third Entry 166

Chapter 19. Someone Else's Hand 174
Chapter 20. A Name as a Gift 182
Chapter 21. Shift 189
Chapter 22. Exit 196
Chapter 23. Unpacking 202
Chapter 24. The Last Days of the Line 208
Chapter 25. Someone Else's Signature 214
Chapter 26. The Name Behind the Resolution 222
Chapter 27. The Withheld Disc 229
Chapter 28. Witness 236
Chapter 29. The Last Address 242
Chapter 30. Deadline 249
Chapter 31. Synchrony 257
Chapter 32. Intrusion 265
Chapter 33. Extraction Without a Copy 273
Chapter 34. New Status 283